The annual meeting of the directors of the society was held in the Church club rooms, on the afternoon of the 21st, when the following officers were elected: President, D. B. Lyman; vice-president, J. H. L. Quick; secretary, F. J. Le Moyne; treasurer, F. F. Ainsworth; finance committee, Messrs. G. D. Boulton, F. T. Haskell, F. J. Le Moyne, and D. B. Lyman. The directors chosen at the convention were arranged in classes, to serve as follows: For one year, Messrs. W. B. Conkey, Le Moyne, and A. J. Walker; for two years, Messrs. E. D. Brigham, Haskell, and Quick; for three years, Messrs. G. P. Blair, Boulton, and Lyman.

Brotherhood of St. Andrew

On Thursday evening, the 20th, the regular quarterly meeting of the local council was held at the Church Club. Though no special business was transacted, something was done in the way of arousing interest in the forthcoming annual convention at Columbus, Ohio, in October next.

A Swedish Mission

The tentative mission among our citizens of Swedish nativity residing in the vicinity of Humboldt Park, started a few months ago under the direction of Mr. Alex. Brunner, licensed as a lay-reader, and which may be regarded as an offshoot of our flourishing St. Ansgarius' parish, appears to be thriving. A Sunday school, with an attendance of 30, has been conducted at 2 P. M. weekly, in the Presbyterian church, corner of Humboldt Boulevard and Courtlandt st., and a regular service held at 3 P. M., with congregations varying in numbers from 40 to 50. The constant attendants now feel so sure of their ground that they are petitioning for the formal organization of a mission, and they have given proof of their faith in its permanency by naming a definite sum as the minimum of their contribution for the support of the Church's ministrations.

Church of the Atonement, Edgewater

On Sunday, the 23d, the Bishop held his visitation, confirming a class of 12 presented by the Rev. J. M. D. Davidson, with one from the church of the Redeemer; the rector left on Monday for a month's vacation in California, the Rev. R. W. Hewitt, late of Moline, taking his duty part of the time.

New York

Henry Codman Potter, D.D., LL.D., Bishop

On July 23d, the Bishop consecrated St. Paul's church, Chester, the Rev. J. H. McGuinness, rector.

Mr. George D. Arthur, for 20 years churchwarden of Trinity church, Scarborough, died July 17th, at an advanced age. He was formerly a banker in New York, but had retired from active business since 1876.

The rector of St. Paul's church, Rome, the Rev. Robert J. Nevin, D.D., LL.D., has arrived in New York from Italy. He comes to officiate at the marriage of President Grant's granddaughter, Miss Julia Dent Grant, to Prince Cantacuze, and will stay for some time at Newport prior to the event.

St. Ignatius' Church, New York

Some of the contemplated improvements announced in THE LIVING CHURCH, will be temporarily postponed, pending the raising of further funds, in order that when undertaken, the work may be carried through without indebtedness.

Gift to St. Paul's, London

Mr. J. Pierpont Morgan, the liberal vestryman of St. George's church, New York, has made an offer to the dean and chapter of St. Paul's cathedral, London, to place in the great church a complete electric lighting plant at a cost of about $25,000. The offer has been accepted.

Open-Air Services

At St. James' church, the Rev. E. Walpole Warren, D.D., rector, the experiment has been tried of preaching in the open air to the poor in crowded streets. One of the parish clergy, the Rev. J. Morris Coerr, has used a wagon as temporary pulpit for this purpose, and preached fully vested.

Grace Church Fresh-Air Work

The first party of mothers and children sent out by the nursery of Grace church to enjoy the Summer Home, returned to the city July 15th. The same day a party of 55 children were sent out, 30 from the Day Nursery, and 25 from Grace Settlement; also 20 mothers with infants have gone to the Home.

Actors' Church Alliance

There was a large gathering in the parish house of St. Chrysostom's chapel, of the Actors' Church Alliance last Wednesday evening. The vicar, the Rev. Thos. H. Sill, presided, and speeches were made by several clergymen, among them, Canon Knowles, who was very happy in his remarks. Songs and recitations were given by the dramatic members of the Alliance, and the first social of the new organization ended with refreshments and dancing. The rooms were crowded, and a large number became members. The first regular monthly service will be held (D. V.) in St. Chrysostom's chapel, on Sunday evening, Oct. 15th, at 8 P. M.

Pennsylvania

Ozi William Whitaker, D.D., LL.D., Bishop

Rectorless Churches

An unusually large number of churches are wanting rectors. Among these may be named: Church of the Holy Apostles; (old) St. John's; free church of St. John, Frankford road; St. Barnabas', Kensington—all of Philadelphia; and Christ church, Eddington. Grace church chapel, West Philadelphia, after July 31st, will need a vicar.

St. Peter's Church, Great Valley

Is one of the old colonial churches, and was one of the six congregations admitted into union with the first convention of the diocese in 1785. For several years past, as no report from the parish has been received, its name has not appeared in the list of churches printed in the convention journal. Its last report stated that the sittings, 250 in number, were all free, and the property, valued at $12,000, free of incumbance.

Poor Children Made Happy

From the very heart of the city slums, 60 little children were taken to Fairmount Park, on the 18th inst., under the chaperonage of two of the women lay helpers of the City Mission. The party was gotten up by the Rev. Dr. H. L. Duhring, superintendent, who supplied the funds for the outing. A substantial luncheon was given the children. It is proposed that these outings be given every Tuesday during the heated term, provided the funds can be raised.

A Kindly Churchwoman

A large number of aged men who have seen better days, residing in the Masonic, Odd Fellows', Hayes' Mechanic, and Old Men's Homes, were given a trip down the river to the head of Delaware Bay, on Thursday, 10th inst, on the steam yacht "May," owned by Mrs. Van Rensselaer, a prominent and benevolent Churchwoman who welcomed them on board, but was obliged to return home on account of illness in her family. The Misses and Mr. Fell accompanied on the trip the guests who were in charge of the Rev. Dr. H. L. Duhring, of the City mission. Ample provision was made for the entertainment and comfort of the aged guests, and a fine luncheon was served on board the yacht. It was a day of delight to the old men who highly appreciated the pleasant outing. It is the intention of Mrs. Van Rensselaer to give the newsboys and bootblacks a similar excursion down the Delaware.

Dr. T. S. Rumnëy's Golden Jubilee

The rector of St. Peter's church, German town, celebrated his golden jubilee of 50 years in the ministry, on Sunday, 16th inst. A memorial Eucharistic service at 7:30 A. M. was followed, at a later hour, by Matins and an historical sermon by Dr. Rumnëy of his half century of ministerial duty. A graduate of the Alexandria Seminary, he was ordered a deacon July 13, 1849, by Bishop Meade, and advanced to the priesthood April 22, 1850, by Assistant Bishop Johns, both of Virginia. He had charge successively of Cople parish (two churches), where, among the children catechised by him, was the late coadjutor-Bishop, Dr. J. B. Newton; St. Mark's, Lewistown, Pa., where the present Bishop of Cairo, the Rt. Rev. Dr. Hale, was a boy in the parish, son of the rector's warden; St. Peter's, Uniontown, Pa.; Grace church, Whiteplains, N. Y.; Christ church, Germantown, and St. Peter's, where he has passed 26 years of pastoral service, and has been its only rector. There were very large congregations at all the services, and the music was elaborate and well rendered by the vested choir. The sum asked for to defray the expenses of the city improvements to the church property was received, and the debt wiped out. The choir presented the venerable rector with a beautiful crayon representing "Easter Morning," organist Staton making the address, to which Dr. Rumnëy feelingly responded. Many former parishioners were present at all the services, especially at the early celebration of the Holy Eucharist.

East Carolina

Alfred Augustin Watson, D.D., Bishop

The Church people at Belhaven having no church building, and using the schoolhouse in the town for a place of worship, have formed a guild, composed of the ladies of the parish, who will devote their energies to the raising a sum of money sufficient to erect a plain house of worship. The Norfolk and Southern R. R. Co. have given two fine lots for this purpose, and the guild has already $50 in bank. Services are held monthly by an evangelist in this town.

Alabama

Richard Hooker Wilmer, D.D., LL.D., Bishop
H. Melville Jackson, D.D., Bishop-coadjutor

A large vested choir has recently been installed in Trinity church, Florence. The ladies of the parish have given the vestments to the choir.

The Sunday school children of Trinity church, Mobile, have already contributed $160 to procure vestments for the male choir who have been in training for the past five months. They will also help to pay for the removal of the organ to the floor of the choir in the church.

Central New York

F. D. Huntington, D.D., LL.D., Bishop

In the absence of the rector, the Rev. E. H. Coley, the services in Calvary church, Utica, through July, are in charge of the Rev. E. C. Hoskins.

During the repairs and improvements in Grace church, Utica, services are held in the chapel, and are conducted by the Rev. John Arthur.

Convocation of the Fourth District

Met in St. Paul's church, Syracuse, the Rev. Dr. H. R. Lockwood, rector, July 6th, the dean, the Rev. P. N. Meade, presiding. The usual routine business was transacted, including the apportionments for parishes and missions, and the stipends for missionaries for the present conventional year. The following officers were elected: Secretary, the Rev. H. G. Coddington; members of the Executive Committee, the Rev. Dr. Lockwood and the Rev. W. De Lancey Wilson; delegate to the Board of Missions, Mr. George C. McWhorter.

North Carolina

Joseph Blount Cheshire, Jr., D.D., Bishop

At St. John's church, Beltsville, Prince George's Co., Md., on Wednesday, July 19th, the Bishop of this diocese, the Rt. Rev. Joseph Cheshire, D.D., was married to Miss Elizabeth Lansdale Mitchell, daughter of the rector of the parish, the Rev. Walter A. Mitchell, who solemnized the marriage.

St. Mary's School, Raleigh

Church people in the various Carolina dioceses are rejoicing in the acceptance by the Rev. T. D. Bratton, of Spartanburg, S. C., of the rectorate of St. Mary's School, in succession to the late lamented Rev. Dr. Bennett Smedes. The alumnae of this famous institution, founded by Dr. Aldert Smedes over half a century ago, are scattered all over the land, and possibly no one agency has done so much in the entire South towards moulding the lives of the daughters of the Church along the lines of the Catholic Faith as this noble school situated at Raleigh. The Smedes, father and son, did for the South what their great-hearted relative, the late Dr. De Koven, would have accomplished for the Church's sons in the Northwest, had his saintly life been spared.

Anniversary of Rev. Dr. M. M. Marshall

Wednesday, July 12th, marked the 25th anniversary of the pastorate of the beloved rector of Christ church, the mother parish of Raleigh. A special service was held on Wednesday evening, which was attended by a very large congregation, not only of his own flock, but by many representatives of the various denominations. Dr. Marshall was assisted in the service by the Rev. Dr. Pittenger, rector of the church of the Good Shepherd. The altar was vested in festal hangings, and was adorned with lights and flowers. The rector made a brief address, in which he spoke feelingly of the ties that had bound priest and people, and recounted some of the blessings that the congregation had enjoyed as a parish during the past quarter of a century. He concluded with a short summary of Baptisms, Confirmations, marriages, and burials, during that period of time. After the service, the senior warden read a letter of congratulation on the part of the vestry, which was signed by all its members, and suitably engrossed. Afterwards, Mr. James Iredell Johnson, on behalf of the congregation, made a presentation of a gift in silver to mark the anniversary. Dr. Marshall was deeply moved by this tender recognition of his long service by the vestry and congregation, and it was with difficulty that he could express in words his sense of gratitude. The gift of silver comprised a bowl and waiter of repousse pattern and very fine workmanship. The bowl bears the following inscription:

Presented to Rev. M. M. Marshall, D. D., by members of Christ church parish, Raleigh, N. C., in grateful commemoration of twenty-five years' faithful ministrations among them as priest, pastor, and friend. July 12th, 1874-1899.

July 12th being also Dr. Marshall's wedding anniversary, the inscription selected for the waiter was:

M. M. M. M. S. M. July 12th, 1866-1899.

An incident of the commemoration that was much appreciated was the omission by the Presbyterians of their usual service for that evening, in order that their pastor and congregation might be able to attend the services.

Michigan City

John Hazen White, D.D., Bishop

At a meeting of the Standing Committee of the diocese held in Elkhart, July 11th, consent was given for the consecration of the Rev. A. L. Williams to be Bishop-coadjutor of Nebraska, and of the Rev. Joseph M. Francis to be Bishop of the diocese of Indiana.

Howe School, Lima

At the annual Commencement of Howe School, Dr. Clarence J. Blake, of Boston, Mass., delivered the annual address upon the "Value of discipline." Dr. Blake is a liberal benefactor of Howe School, and has made provision for extensive improvements in Blake Hall for next year, also the addition of a well-equipped infirmary. Bishop White presented the diplomas to the members of the graduating class, and took occasion to refer to the year's work as the most successful year Howe School has ever had. At the annual meeting of the board of trustees held the same day, improvements in the property were ordered to the extent of $5,000.

Pittsburgh

Cortlandt Whitehead, D.D., Bishop

St. Matthew's, Homestead

On Friday evening, July 21st, the cornerstone of the new church was laid by the Bishop, with appropriate ceremonies. Other clergy taking part in the service were the Rev. Messrs. C. L. Bates, William Thompson, and L. F. Cole. Addresses were made by the Rev. Messrs. Rosenmuller, Heffern, W. J. White, and the Bishop. The vested choir furnished the music. The new church is situated at the corner of Eighth and McClure sts., this very central location having been secured to take the place of the lot on the hill upon which the old church was situated. The building will be of brick, and in connection with it, and adjoining the rear end, will be a commodious rectory, the whole superstructure to cost about $12,000. This promising work is the outcome of a mission started in this place some 14 years ago by the rector of the church of the Good Shepherd, Pittsburgh, the Rev. D. C. Peabody, now of Mobile.

Newark

Thomas Alfred Starkey, D.D., Bishop

St. Paul's, East Orange, Freed from Debt

The Rev. John W. Williams, rector of St. Paul's church, East Orange, read a letter to the congregation, Sunday, July 16th, from Mr. Walter Kerr, treasurer of the building committee, stating that through the generosity of Mr. F. Pearsall Campbell, of Roseville, the mortgage on the church property, amounting to $5,000, had been paid off, and that the church was now free from debt. The service, after the announcement, partook of the nature of a thanksgiving.

Brotherhood of St. Andrew

The regular bi monthly meeting of the local council was held in the Epiphany Sunday school room on Monday evening, July 17th. There was a large and enthusiastic gathering of men who listened to a spirited address from the Rev. Arthur S. Lloyd, on the words, "Where there is no vision, the people perish." Short addresses were also made by several of the local Brotherhood men. Very encouraging reports were given of the services being held each Sunday at Colonial Beach on the Potomac, by members of the Brotherhood from Washington. During the brief business meeting, the president of the council, Mr. Frank Evans, explained the efforts being made to secure a large attendance at the annual convention to be held at Columbus, Ohio.

Albany

William Crosswell Doane, D.D., LL.D., Bishop

New Organ for Bethesda Church, Saratoga

Friends of the rector, the Rev. Dr. Carey, have presented a new organ, costing $10,000. The donors are Mr. and Mrs. Spencer Trask, and it is expected that it will be put in place in the fall. Bethesda church has a fine vested choir, and a new organ will be of great service to the musical part of the services.

Church of the Holy Cross, Troy

A very choice set of embroidery has recently been presented. It consists of a centre piece and orphreys for the white silk altar frontal, the handiwork as well as the gift of Miss H. F. Rousseau whose skill and devotion have in similar ways been repeatedly expressed at the church of the Holy Cross.

St. James' Church, Fort Edward

Bishop Doane made his annual visit to this parish June 10th. He confirmed a class of seven presented by the rector, the Rev. Robert Scott. A large congregation listened attentively to the clear and practical discourse of the Bishop on the work of the Holy Spirit. After the service, the Bishop had a conference with the wardens of the church, and met individually those confirmed.

Long Island

Abram N. Littlejohn, D.D., LL.D., Bishop

The Hall Vacation School has been opened in the Hall Memorial House of Holy Trinity parish, Brooklyn, and is proving quite a success, 188 boys and girls having registered the first day.

The Church Bible Association, of which the Rev. Robert Weeks is president, met recently, with Mr. Weeks, at Riverhead. A paper was read by the Rev. H. E. Wellman, printing of which was requested for general circulation as peculiarly suited to help the faith of those readers of the Bible who have not the time or means to pursue the learned investigations necessary to meet the allegations of the higher critics.

Brotherhood of St. Andrew

The summer meeting of the New York and Long Island local assemblies was held in St. Joseph's church, Queens, L. I., on Saturday, July 15th. At the afternoon session, addresses were made by Dr. Wm. C. Sturgis, of New Haven, Conn., and Mr. Wm. T. Heffer, of New York, the subject being "Bible classes," followed by an interesting discussion. In the evening, a public meeting was held in the Queens Lyceum, at which, after an address of welcome by the Rev. G. Wharton McMulin, Dr. Sturgis spoke on "Why we use the Prayer Book," and Mr. Silas McBee on "Why we have bishops," the subjects being summed up in an able address by the Rev. Dr. H. C. Swentzel. Two hundred delegates were entertained at supper by the ladies of St. Mary's guild. The afternoon conference was presided over by Mr. William Braddon, and at the evening meeting, Mr. John W. Wood acted as chairman. In every way, the occasion was most successful.

Maine

Henry Adams Neely, D.D., Bishop

The Rev. H. L. Wood, rector of Trinity church, Saco, Me., is conducting an afternoon service each Sunday in July and August, at Bay View House, near Old Orchard.

Oklahoma and Indian Territory

Francis Key Brooke, D.D., Missionary Bishop

A four-roomed house has been purchased at South McAlester, to be used as a rectory. At Wagoner, money has been gathered to move the church to the front of its lot, and to place a tower entrance in front.

All Saints' Hospital, South McAlester

Important improvements are in progress. A tank for water, a force pump, movable bath tub, and pipes for drainage, are being put in place. Outside help will be needed. The work of the hospital demands that it be materially improved in its facilities this summer.

Maryland

William Paret, D.D., LL.D., Bishop

Church Home and Infirmary, Baltimore

The 41st annual report shows in every respect an increase over last year's work. Financially, the year has been a prosperous one, closing with a small balance. More than $7,000 has been added to the Home's funds from two legacies. During the year 385 inmates (including 40 children) were cared for. Among those admitted were five of our clergymen, all of whom had the privilege of private rooms without charge.

Ohio

Wm. Andrew Leonard, D.D., Bishop

The Bishop, at the recent convention, spoke as follows of his work in Europe: "Our duty in Europe is not missionary—that is to say—we have churches in the great capitals, not that we may convert Romanists to our Reformed Church, but that we may bring the comfortable ministrations of the Church to our resident Americans and our tourists who are temporarily abroad. We have some very handsome church edifices, an excellent corps of clergymen, a large constituency, and a satisfactory work. I was deeply touched by the eagerness with which young men and women who had come from our State of Ohio, and were studying art, medicine, or music in European schools, sought me out, and claimed me as their own. It comforted them to see their Bishop, and to receive his advice, or his welcome and encouragement. It relieved their lonesomeness, and it deepened their affection for the Church. And people of the religious denominations also came to me, with their claim on a relationship that I was only too thankful to accept. I have journeyed far, and at times with some degree of weariness, but I hope that as a result our American churches in Europe have been blessed, and our people united. The convocation at Nice, in April, was intensely interesting—a small convention, and a union of hearts and service in the Lord's work."

The North-east Convocation

Met at Boardman, the Rev. W. Fred Allen, rector, July 10th and 11th. On Monday, Evening Prayer was said, and the Bishop preached a missionary sermon. On Tuesday, at 7:30 A. M., Holy Communion was celebrated by the Bishop. The clergy took breakfast together at the rectory. At 9:30 Morning Prayer was said, after which the business session was held, the Bishop presiding. Bishop Leonard spoke on the changing of the convocational system so as to make it more effective for missionary work. Archdeacon Abbott explained that the new system now under consideration would be a great help to the diocesan missionary board in recommending appropriations for mission stations, appointments from parishes and missions for diocesan missions, and also in suggesting men for appointment to mission parishes. The convocation as a missionary body was discussed by the Rev. Messrs. Ingham, Kell, and Allen. Reports of missionary work were made by the Rev. Messrs. Ingham, Allen, Atwater, Kell, and Lafferty. The Rev. H. M. Ingham invited the convocation to Trinity parish, Jefferson, for its next meeting, which was accepted. The Rev. Geo. P. Atwater read an excellent paper on the subject, "Our attitude to the separated brethren." In the discussion which followed, all the clergy took part. An excellent lunch, and, later, tea were served under the trees on the rectory lawn, and were thoroughly enjoyed. At 7:30 evening service was held, when the Ven. A. A. Abbott and the Rev. Robt. Kell spoke on "The offertory as an act of worship." The archdeacon said the closing prayers and pronounced the benediction, thus closing one of the most delightful meetings of the convocation.

Kansas

Frank Rosebrook Millsapaugh, D.D., Bishop

The Church at Dwight Freed from Debt

The Rev. David Brooke, as lay reader, deacon, and priest, for many years has served this mission. He built, several years ago, by great exertion, a little church and house combined, but had to borrow of the Church Building Fund $300. This has been a great burden to him. A noble Churchman in the East heard from the Bishop of the aged missionary's anxiety, and the other day sent him a receipt from the C. B. F. Commission for the whole amount. If the giver could have met the receiver when the Bishop informed him, he would have said: "Verily, it is better to give than to receive."

South Carolina

Ellison Capers, D.D., Bishop

William Euston Home, Charleston

Has been the recipient of a handsome silver Communion service of five pieces, from the Rev. Isaac S. Hartley, D.D., of Great Barrington, Mass. On a visit to Charleston he was invited to hold a service in the beautiful little chapel connected with this noble charity. The Rev. Mr. Hartley was a relative of Mr. Euston, the founder, an Englishman who made his fortune in Charleston, and dying without issue, left his estate to found and support an institution which would give a home to aged couples and indigent ladies. Already 30 odd cottages have been erected and occupied, and from time to time more are to be added.

St. Thomas and St. Denis, Wando

The Rev. R. J. Walker, priest-in-charge, reports $500 in bank for a new chapel on the seashore, which the parish hopes to build soon. The Ladies' Guild, the vestry, and the congregation generally, are all helping in the good work of the Church here, which is reaching and interesting Methodists, Presbyterians, and Baptists, in the vicinity. Bishop Capers has just made a visitation here, and confirmed a young lady, celebrated the Holy Eucharist, and preached two eloquent and spiritual sermons. The degree of D. D. was bestowed on the Rev. Mr. Walker recently.

Iowa

Theodore Nevill Morrison, D.D., Bishop

Triennial Report of Rev. H. H. Morrill

The parish at Clinton has for three years past been in charge of the Rev. H. H. Morrill. During that period he has officiated at 43 funerals, baptized 156 persons, presented 152 for Confirmation. The total expenditures, including the building and furnishing of the new stone church, are $21,000.

Western Michigan

George De Normandie Gillespie, D.D., Bishop

St. Luke's Church, Kalamazoo

This church, the Rev. R. R. Claiborne, rector, has been presented with an elegant brass and oak pulpit, brass processional cross, and two double seat carved oak clergy stalls. The endowment fund, amounting to considerably over $20,000, will be increased by a legacy of $500 from the late Mrs. Silas Hubbard.

The Church in China

FROM THE North China Daily News

The work that is being done by St. John's College, Shanghai, under the able staff to whom the guidance of its destinies is confided, is a larger one than appears on the surface. In St. John's and other colleges is being prepared the leaven which will bring about, we hope, the rising of a new China. The immediate future of China is dark enough, but it is impossible that a great homogeneous people, intelligent and energetic, should be permanently divided up among alien Powers. It does not seem that the partition of China, if it be continued as now appears inevitable, can be permanent. The young men who are now having an invaluable portion of Western culture superadded to their inextinguishable Chinese nature, will acquire a true patriotism with the other Western virtues in which they are being instructed, and, as we pointed out the other day, a man or a body of men will arise among these young men who will reconstruct their country from the ruin into which it is now falling. If these young men do not then forget the teaching that they are now receiving at St. John's and similar colleges, the country that they will reconstruct will be worthy to take its place among the great nations of the world. Ingratitude towards their teachers has never been a trait of the Chinese character, though it has been sometimes imputed to the island people to the eastward.

Editorials and Contributions

THE death of Mr. Ingersoll is announced. We contemplate the event without other feeling than one of sympathy with his family whom he loved with all the ardor of a very affectionate nature. We drop a tear of regret when we think of a life perverted from its destined aim, but we also pray that he may find a better immortality than that of which he wrote but a few weeks ago—probably his last words:

"Immortality,
With its countless hopes and fears beating against the shores of time and faith,
Was not born of any book, nor of any creed, nor of any religion.
It was born of human affection, and it will continue to ebb and flow
Beneath the mists and clouds of doubt and darkness as long as love kisses the lips of death.
It is the rainbow hope, shining on the tears of grief."

May he have already discovered the deeper truth that human affection is but the imperfect reflex of the love of God!

MR. INGERSOLL was born in Western New York. His mother, a lovely character, died when he was four years old. His father was one of the sternest and most uncompromising of Puritan Calvinists, and his family discipline was one of rigor and severity. He belonged to the race of men, now passed away, who would not spare the rod in training the youthful mind to acquire the love of the Westminster Catechism. Reared without the influence of a mother's gentleness of love, Ingersoll's early regimen prepared him for severe reaction against the paternal belief. It has always been to us a source of pity that he should have identified Christianity with that travesty and corruption of it which Calvinism is,—a mistake which has created many unbelievers, and which gave him great influence over thousands of men who listened to his brilliant invective, who had themselves been reared under a system against which their better nature revolted. Perhaps we may confess that the career of Mr. Ingersoll as a lecturer tended to good, at least in the sense that it tore up by the roots that malign philosophy which so many Protestant bodies have identified with the very essence of the Gospel, but which, happily, they are now seldom preaching and scarcely believing.

MR. INGERSOLL was a destroyer, not a builder. Had he known by processes of careful investigation the true genius of Christ's religion, he would possibly have discriminated more justly, and while launching his thunderbolts against error and corruption, have championed the Gospel of Divine Love and Sweet Reasonableness. Many years ago a vestryman at Peoria remonstrated with him on account of his iconoclastic spirit. "Yes," said he, "I feel less satisfied with going about the country killing gods than I would if I had something to set up in their place." But here stepped in that Moloch of covetousness which grinds to dust beneath its iron heel many a man's honest inner convictions. As The Times-Herald says:

The mistake of Ingersoll's life was the adoption of agnosticism as his mission, from which it degenerated into a mercenary profession. He had no new gospel to preach. He merely maintained a negative, exhausting his eloquence and satire in knocking the props from under the faith of his Christian countrymen.

Whatever new light may now have dawned upon his immortal spirit, whatever enchantments of prejudice may now be dissolved, the influence of Mr. Ingersoll's words will continue to draw many away from the faith of Christ; but it will be a vanishing influence, for its power was due less to what he said, than to the captivating manner in which he said it; less to his coarse, but genial, invective, than to his strikingly attractive personality.

WE happened to pick up a secular paper of May 16th, in which there is a telegram from Providence, announcing that the Briggs affair had brought to the Presiding Bishop "a vast amount of correspondence and many telegrams." Of course the Presiding Bishop had no more official relation to the ordination than the Pope of Rome, but there are a good many people who have somehow contracted the impression that there is a kind of dim analogy between His Holiness and our president of the House of Bishops, when, in point of fact, whatever may be argued by his advocates in favor of Roman supremacy, nobody, of any of the several if not numerous types of Churchmanship among us, would seriously claim for our Presiding Bishop anything in the way of authority, except what is given him in the written Constitution and Canons of the Protestant Episcopal Church. He occupies an honorable position, but his duties are largely clerical. He is a bishop chosen under a rule to preside over the assembled bishops, and in the interim to perform certain official functions which are designated in the Constitution and Canons, and no other duty belongs to him. Should he exercise personal authority over and beyond the written law, he would be guilty of an act of usurpation. No one knew this or expressed it more emphatically than the late Bishop of Connecticut, and probably the time is ripe for a careful consideration of this whole subject. The question naturally arises:

Is there a process of evolution under way in this Church, by which the presidency of the House of Bishops is to become archiepiscopal, with primate powers?

God forbid!

UPON the subject of the consecration of Dr. Funsten as Bishop of Boise, we have only to say that we regret that it should have taken place at this time. We agree with those who consider that when the declination was so far accepted as final as to have led the Presiding Bishop to make it the ground of official action, to the extent of issuing a formal summons to the House of Bishops to fill the vacant bishopric, a situation was created which made it extremely doubtful whether the consecration could properly take place without a new election. The Presiding Bishop has announced that eleven bishops out of the whole number indicated their disapproval. The Bishop of Springfield filed a formal protest. To offset this, it appears that others were equally emphatic in favor of the consecration. We have no means of knowing how many did not express themselves at all. It really did not seem that it could do any harm to delay the matter until the coming meeting of the House of Bishops, when it might have been thoroughly threshed out. As it is, this affair clearly indicates a direction in which legislation is needed, and no doubt some measure will be brought forward looking to the settlement of such questions, before the revision of the Constitution and Canons is completed. The action which has been taken in this case settles nothing.

IT is reported in a daily paper that Bishop McVickar, referring to the opponents of the Briggs' ordination, said: "They can howl if they desire, but that is all that it can amount to." Of course Dr. McVickar is too courteous a person to have indulged in such Bowery language, nor is it necessary that he should repudiate it. But it is well to repudiate the opinion that those who deprecate the action of the Bishop of New York belong to those departments of the animal kingdom which depend mainly on howling for self-defence. Perhaps, further, it may be pointed out as a token at once of weakness and of arrogance to use such a term, whoever did it. This Church has a good many more than 7,000 who have not bowed the knee to the Baal of Broadism, and they are not howling. They are mostly waiting in great quietness and confidence to see whether our bishops have the courage of their convictions in this great crisis; and still further, whether those who do not expect much from that quarter will themselves, being priests, rise to the emergency.

THE ethics of subscription is a subject which will forge to the front in times like these. If it does not attract the attention of the ostrich editors who hide their heads in the sands of optimism and so dispose of a great crisis, it does impress the mind of the secular editor. The New York Sun for instance, has been astonished to find that men are willing to swear allegiance to that which they distinctly repudiate as necessary factors of the Christian Faith. "'Tis true, 'tis pity; and pity 'tis, 'tis true.'" The Sun says: "However artfully Dr. — may fight shy of the irresistible conclusion of his own criticisms, honest intelligence is bound to reach it. His proper place, manifestly, is outside the Christian Church, and among its assailants." That is the secular verdict. Why is it not also the verdict of all honorable men? The Church has room and range for "many men of many minds," but no room for men who do not hold the Catholic Faith in its integrity as interpreted by the Church. We heartily agree with the words of Bishop Potter, as we find them in the New York Tribune, Feb. 15, 1895:

It ought to be clear enough, even to the most interrogative mind, that a divine society which claims to rest upon "most certain facts," cannot consent that any one who is clothed with authority to teach and bear witness to these facts, shall surrender or impugn or disparage them, until the body that has commissioned him has authorized him to do so. His office and authority, first, last, and all the time, are representative, and when the time comes that he finds himself requiring a larger liberty than his official obligations concede to him, common honesty would seem to require that he should seek it outside, not inside, of a fellowship to which his vows and promises, in the matter of what he shall teach and hold, are both definite and explicit.

A PRIEST who has been embarrassed in the burial of the dead by the insistence of relatives that Masonic rites should be introduced, asks for suggestions as to how unseemly friction may be avoided. As a rule, when Masonic ceremonies are desired in the burial of a Churchman, they follow the committal at the grave, and there is no friction. When the priest has concluded the service his responsibility ends; what follows does not concern him. In the case cited by our correspondent, it seems that the Masons objected to having their ceremonies in their proper place after the committal at the grave; they could not consent "to bury a man who had been buried already." As the family preferred Masonic burial to Christian burial, they had their choice and the priest retired. He showed a large charity in having prayers with the afflicted people before leaving them, having come twenty miles to bury their dead and being then repudiated. This is a case in which we think a "weighty cause" existed for reading the committal at the house, and giving way to the demand for Masonic rites at the grave.

The Church and Biblical Criticism

THE Church can afford to maintain serene composure in the face of the critical contentions of scholars in the field of Holy Scripture. In so far as the theories of these scholars are based upon disbelief of the supernatural and of its miraculous manifestations, they have no meaning for the Church of Christ. The same is true when the critics reject that view of inspiration which is a part of the Christian tradition, and refusing to admit its special character, identify it with the "inspiration of genius" as seen in the sages and poets of the nations. The Church also declines to allow the individual, however learned, to exercise the right of rectifying the sacred canon, and of pointing out to her what books she should receive and what exclude. Her methods of interpretation, in like manner—her application, for instance, of a spiritual manner of exegesis, and her apprehension of the symbolical significance of Old Testament events and institutions—are hardly open to the intrusion of the critical spirit. She learned from Christ and the holy Evangelists to search in the Scriptures for Christ, beginning with Moses and all the Prophets, and she saw this method applied by St. Paul and by the first Apostles. However useful she may find what is now called the "historical method" for certain purposes, she will never substitute that or any other purely secular exegesis for that to which the Holy Spirit guided her from the first. The early representative of this secular or "common-sense" exegesis was Theodore of Mopsuestia, unpleasantly associated in the Christian mind with heretical pravity. In recent times the professed adherents of this exegesis as the exclusive method of interpreting Holy Scripture, have astonished us by efforts of the "historical imagination," in which facts are moulded or created in a manner which could hardly be outdone by the most extreme and whimsical devotee of mysticism.

NO doubt the critical analysis of the Old Testament books has its own interest, but its importance has been absurdly overestimated. If we could be assured beyond the possibility of doubt that all the books of the Old Testament as we have them, are the outcome of compilations from many and various documents, even to the minute piecing together of sentences, words, and phrases, as some of our critics claim—witness the Polychrome Bible—we fail to see how the doctrine of inspiration is in the least affected. The inspiration of St. Luke in composing his Gospel was never called in question because he describes himself as carefully tracing out the facts which he records, and implies that he made use of previous documents as well as oral information. Whatever interesting indications of this kind may be brought to light, the Church will continue to hold that in and through the Old Testament holy men of old spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost. The human voice and pen may be defective instruments, the materials of ink and parchment subject to all sorts of vicissitudes, and copyists may blunder; yet in and through whatever there may be of defect, inadequacy, or imperfection, the Word of God is everywhere uttered. Even in alterations, transpositions, and repetitions, and in an apparently new sense given in translation—of which there are examples in the Greek New Testament as compared with the Hebrew—the Holy Spirit may preside and make His own that which the critic charges to human blundering and misapprehension merely. It must ever be remembered that in these matters we are moving in the world of the supernatural, that to the Church the Bible is not "like any other book," and is not to be treated as such. To her it is always and everywhere the Word of God. The condescension of the Infinite to association with the finite is, and must ever remain, a mystery. This mystery necessarily attaches to the relation of the divine and the human elements in Holy Scripture, and it is one which no efforts of criticism can ever hope to solve. Men may deny, but they cannot explain.

A RECENT number of The Critical Review affords some interesting examples of the present spirit and tendency of criticism in certain regions of the Old Testament. For a long time there has been a settled determination to deny that any of the Psalms were written before the Exile, and especially that any of them were composed by David, "The Sweet Singer of Israel." Many and various reasons more or less ingenious were alleged in support of this proposition so opposed to the ancient and universal tradition of the Jewish people and their literature. But Professor Robertson, of Glasgow, an Old Testament scholar of no mean learning and ability, in the Croall Lectures of 1893-'4, has taken issue with all this, and shown to the satisfaction of unbiased minds that there was abundant room in the earlier age for the rise of such compositions as the Psalms. What he has set himself to do, and what he has succeeded in doing, is to break down the presumption the "advanced" critics have endeavored to create, and to show that the presumption is really the other way. But now comes Canon Driver to tell us that this is of no avail unless Professor Robertson can inform us distinctly what Psalms are pre-exilic. To most people, however, it will seem a matter of some importance to have refuted the assertion that "none of the Psalms could have been written before the Exile." Canon Driver takes Professor Robertson to task for not doing what he did not undertake to do, in order to minimize what he did do. It is significant also that the Canon has to admit that other critics had already arrived at substantially the same results with Robertson. He does this, to be sure, in order to detract from the originality of the latter, but nevertheless betrays the fact that conclusions which Cheyne et al. have treated as final, are by no means so settled as they would have us suppose.

ANOTHER feature of Old Testament criticism for some time past, has been the denial of the "predictive" element in prophecy. This, for many ages, formed one of the most convincing arguments for Christianity. Early Christian history makes it evident that it played the largest part in the rapid progress of the Church among the Jews of Jerusalem. No argument so effectually silenced the adversaries of the Faith. But now comes modern criticism, and tells us that there was nothing in all this. It is, perhaps, well to say that this has been the teaching of "certain" critics, rather than of "the" critics, since there are few points on which they all agree. Still, it seems true that those who have chiefly held the public ear of late, have been those who minimized or explained away the predictions of the prophets. But in the long run it is impossible to blink the plain facts of the case, and some leading scholars, sufficiently opposed to supernatural conceptions, have felt the difficulty, and attempted to meet it by admitting some kind of extraordinary foresight. Of late a reaction has set in, and it is beginning to be admitted that the foreknowledge of the prophets can only be explained as having its source in divine illumination. One of the latest evidences of this is a monograph from Dr. Giesebrecht, of the University of Gottingen, who expresses a firm belief in the supernatural origin of Hebrew prophecy. Surely, in view of all these ups and downs of criticism, the Church can well afford to possess her soul in patience and go on unconcerned with her work of saving souls, using the sacred Scriptures as she always has used them, unshaken in her conviction that they are in very truth the Word of God.

The Assault on Holy Scripture

FROM THE CONVENTION ADDRESS OF THE BISHOP OF LONG ISLAND

I HAVE spoken of the advancing knowledge of our own time and of God's use of it in pleading His cause. There is one phase of this knowledge—the self-styled Higher Criticism of the Canonical Scriptures of the Old and New Testament—which I may not pass over in silence; but of which I would speak plainly, and yet in such terms as will exempt me from imputations of prejudice or dogmatism. Neither time nor space is allowed me to go into details. I wish simply to indicate the wise and safe attitude of mind on the general subject. As teachers of the truth, we desire to know the whole truth, and to be seekers after it until we find it; but, because we are such, it is part of our responsibility to see that we are not deceived or misled. The new learning has been enterprising even to audacity, and venturesome even to rashness. The modesty and caution of true science have not been reckoned among its virtues. From the older learning it has not asked for hospitality, but for unconditional surrender. It may be true that the old tradition regarding the canon of Holy Scriptures needs in some parts "the refiner's fire" and "the fuller's soap"; but it does not follow that it has no real authority and deserves to be treated as a tangled "mass of rubbish." Correction and destruction are not equivalent terms.

Of some things we have a knowledge not open to challenge, and these are the things which enable us to foretell the final outcome of the critical rationalism of our time. We know that God will take care of His own cause on earth, and that an essential part of His cause is the integrity and veracity of the Record of His revelations to man. How He will do so—whether by a more profound and reverent scholarship, or by now undreamed-of discoveries among the hidden annals of a far-off past, or by imparting to the moral side of human reason a clearer and deeper insight of spiritual truth, or by any among a thousand other possible means—it is not for us to say. We know that by the Christ's sure promise the Holy Spirit dwells in His Church as its Teacher and Guide, and that as such He will lead it into the way of all truth, and give it a right judgment in all things pertaining to the ends for which it was established, and especially to its office as the divinely appointed keeper of the oracles of God.

We know that the Saviour's image and superscription are cut too deeply into the face of the world's life ever to be obliterated by the acids of critical learning. We know that the graving tools of history and revelation, so long used for this purpose, cannot be cast aside. We know how vainly, during all the Christian centuries, the rough, "estranging seas" from the outer ocean of the world's thought have dashed against "the Rock of Ages." We know, too, that the God-man, Christ Jesus, who came down from heaven for us men and our salvation, cannot be dislodged from the Scriptures which testify of Him and which are, in a sense, bone of His bone and flesh of His flesh. We know, moreover, that, in spite of all the confusing voices of the hour, these Scriptures, from the germinal promise given to man in the beginning, to its final fulfillment by the coming of the Son of Man, witness to him with a unity, continuity, and cumulative distinctness impossible of rational explanation except as effects of supernatural direction. Knowing these things, what matters it if some tell us that the earlier parts of the Sacred Record are to some extent compilations of myths and legends of primeval man; or that a certain book of prophecy turns out to be an historical fiction; or that another one has a triple instead of a single authorship; or that though we have the four Gospels written by Evangelists who companied with Jesus, we have not the very words of Jesus, but differing reports of what He said; or that the book which closes the drama of the ages, and pictures the City of God with the Lamb throned in the midst thereof, is an amalgam of once detached Apocalyptic visions? I say, what matters it if such things, many of them not yet proven, are claimed by the new learning? The sun is not less the source of light and heat because of a few newly discovered spots on its disc. What is organic is not the less so because of the shifting or loss of this or that individual particle. So with the Record of the Word of eternal life—the Wisdom of God put in finite form for human use. Let us not doubt, but steadfastly believe, that God has revealed Himself to man at sundry times and in divers ways; that He has inspired chosen men to make an infallible record of these revelations; that Christ's body—the Church—is the pillar and ground of that record; that her witness will not fail or herself "be removed," because "God is in the midst of her," and that, as members of that body, "the Lord of hosts is with us; the God of Jacob is our refuge."

"Arise, O God, and plead Thine own cause."

Letters to the Editor

A PLEA FOR THE CHILDREN

To the Editor of The Living Church:

In your excellent paper it has been lately stated that it is a "burden" to children to attend Church services, in addition to Sunday school. Now your correspondent "Y. Y. K." reprimands the clergy for their merciful shortening of our over-long services by baptizing at a different time from the regular Morning and Evening Prayers, and I see in another paper a statement that some prominent sectarian minister has declared that Churches, in general, have arranged things with little, or no, regard to the character, wishes, and interests of children. These statements remind me that, during a ministry of thirty years, it has been a never-ceasing source of wonder to me to observe how thoroughly children are ignored in most arrangements of the Church. One would suppose that the gray-beards who arranged the services, and almost everything else, never were children themselves, or else have utterly forgotten how children feel and act. My own memory as to my childhood is clear, and I can say, without exaggeration, that if I had been given my choice to attend an Episcopal service when I was ten years old, or to take a whipping, I should have chosen the latter, provided that the blows did not draw blood. That was in the sad old times when the clergy felt compelled to have Morning Prayer, Litany, a long, dry sermon, and the Holy Communion, and, perhaps, Baptism, too, all at one time, and the secular papers were saying; "The Episcopal Church does not know how much it is losing by its long services," etc., etc.

After all, who and what are these children? I should like to state three facts which most of our elderly men seem, from their conduct, to be unaware of; i. e., children have immortal souls; they are to be men and women in five or ten years, and they are now forming habits that are likely to be life-long. If, say fifty years ago, our Church had made such rules as these: No service shall ever exceed one hour in length. The sacraments shall always be administered as separate services. Sermons shall never exceed twenty minutes in length, and shall be expressed in the simplest possible phraseology, and with many illustrations and anecdotes. Church music shall be as simple and melodious as possible. Choirs shall always, when possible, consist of at least a dozen persons, whether children or adults, and shall be encouraged to sing with rapidity and enthusiasm. Well, if such eccentric rules had been made and enforced, the writer firmly believes that two other very eccentric things would have followed; i. e., children would have enjoyed attending Church services, and would have attended in large numbers; and further, the Episcopal Church would have swept over the land like a prairie fire.

CHURCH MUSIC AND CHOIRS

To the Editor of The Living Church:

"Great care must be taken not to magnify and make too prominent the music in the worship of God's house. I have a feeling that oftentimes too much is made of it; it is too much talked about; too much advertised; too much praised and commended; too much expected of it, sometimes even by the pastor himself."—BISHOP OF OREGON.

The above clipping has just come to my attention. I have heard several rectors express the same fear that music would become the chief attraction in our Church services, and it has always been a puzzle to me why it should be a cause for fear. It is very seldom that we hear any fear expressed by any of the clergy that an ornate and beautiful ritual—a service pleasing to the eye—would interfere with or distract the worshiper in his devotions. Why then should beautiful music be more harmful? Why should pleasing the ear be more harmful than pleasing the eye?

To me, and in fact to the great majority of mankind, beautiful music is the "opea sesame" to the deep recesses of the heart. How many a poor sinner has been drawn to a church to hear the music, and then when some beautiful hymn or anthem has opened his heart, words filled with the love of Christ have found lodgment therein and turned him from a downward course. It seems to me that any means so innocent, so inspiring, so heart-penetrating, as beautiful music, should be welcomed rather than frowned upon, as a means of drawing those who walk in paths of darkness, into the house of God.

It is a widespread complaint among ministers of the Gospel in these days, that they are losing their influence in drawing people within the sound of their voice. Why then should they turn the cold shoulder upon such an innocent and effective means of bringing people into the temple—people who would never enter its doors except for the attraction of music—where they can be told of the love of their Father in heaven.

To say nothing of the power of music to draw sinners within the sound of the Gospel, it is an inspiration and comfort to the Churchman himself. How uplifting, how near heaven is the devout soul drawn by the grand harmony of some beautiful anthem or hymn. How inspiring the same ought to be to the clergyman himself, and when both clergyman and worshiper are under this spell of inspiration, a flood of divine blessing is poured upon both, and something of heaven is brought down to earth. Who will say that the world is not better for that grand, that incomparable, production, the "Messiah"? Christ never seemed so real to me as when I was under the spell of the beautiful strains of that heaven-born song of the Redeemer. If we are to keep real life in our churches, music—the most beautiful we can get—must be one of the features of the services.

Minneapolis, July, 1899.

THE ACTORS' CHURCH ALLIANCE

To the Editor of The Living Church:

Permit me to say a word in answer to "D.D.," in your last issue. Self-respecting, earnest men do not, as a rule, trouble themselves with critics who are afraid to sign their names, but as I have reason to believe my D. D. brother is the same who wrote recently a long, captious letter to the New York Sun, under the nom-de-plume, "A Protestant Episcopal Clergyman," I deem it necessary (to save further perversion and willful misconception) to say a word in defence of a movement that has magnificent possibilities for good, and, to say the least, deserves serious and intelligent consideration.

In the first place, Bishop Potter is the president; so far, that is true, but the Unitarian minister is not the first vice-president, but the second, the first office being held by F. F. Mackay, Esq., president of the Actors' Society. As for several Jewish rabbis being enrolled as members, I only know of one; to wit., the eminent Rabbi Silverman, of Temple Emmanuel, New York, and this gentleman represents his brethren on our council. This council consists of twenty members—ten from the Churches and ten from the stage, and seven out of the ten constituting the Church section are Churchmen, and, for that matter, so are the majority of the dramatic section; and with the president and secretary Churchmen, in addition, what could we wish for more?

Our critic is wrong again when he speaks of the Church and Stage Guild in England being composed exclusively of Churchmen; but I will agree with him if he means the Actors' Church Union, of which the Lord Bishop of Rochester is the head. I am English-born, but I have sense enough to know it is impossible to work on the same lines in this country where there is no State or dominant Church, and where all denominations are equal before the law. Why, then, have we no right to the word "Church" Alliance taken in its widest sense? Are not all baptized persons members of Christ's Body—the Holy Catholic Church, of which in this country the P. E. Church is the heart and solid centre—the nucleus of the Church that is and "that is to be," when our Blessed Lord's prayer for unity (not uniformity) shall have received its fulfillment?

As for the Jews, we must remember there are many, particularly managers, in the dramatic profession, and the Gospel is to be preached to "every" creature; are we to leave out of our calculation the great race of which our Lord Himself was a member? Shall we carp and cavil in these times and conditions at a movement which may induce Jews to attend Christian services when they see fit to do so, and which, above all else, recognizes the essential brotherhood of all God's children?

The chasm between these two great life forces, the devotional and the dramatic, has existed long enough, and if in our attempts to bridge it, we have adapted our plan to conditions as we find them, is it not the only sane way to attain success, and should it not appeal to all clean-hearted and clear-headed men and women to "come over and help us"?

REV. WALTER E. BENTLEY,
Sec'y. A. C. A.

624 E. 179th st., New York, July 22d, 1899.

Alarming Ritualism

WE gather from the Christian World that there is a very decided movement among the so-called followers of Wesley in the direction of Ritualism. In a paragraph in that journal it is stated that in a Wesleyan meeting house at Bedford there are all the features of a church—choir stalls, railed off sanctuary, vested altar with ornaments, a large reredos, a lectern, and many crosses. The preacher is said to change his place during the service, reading the Church Prayer Book from his stall, and the lessons from the lectern, preaching from the pulpit, and then placing the alms on the altar. We are not surprised in the least, especially after the recent evidences of a newly-developed taste for "man-millinery" in the once simple and unadorned Methodist sect. Indeed, we fear that the taste is infecting a much larger community, for we notice that a large section of the Dissenting press has been in ecstasies over Mr. Price Hughes' get up at the Prince of Wales's levee. Glowing paragraphs have dwelt with rapture upon Mr. Hughes' knee-breeches, his shoe-buckles, his cassock, and his gown—that habit which a Spanish Ambassador once admiringly reported to be the Dominican dress retained by the English clergy! One paper, we observed, seemed to regret the fact that Mr. Hughes was not further adorned with lace ruffles, like those worn by the Moderator of the Scottish Establishment at Assembly time, the cost of which is said to be £60. We have known "ritualistic" priests sent to prison, with the approval of the Protestant press, for wearing a vestment which might have cost a couple of sovereigns, but it seems that, if only you call yourself a Protestant, you can indulge in any amount of man-millinery, from silver shoe-buckles and knee-breeches, up to costly ruffles. To us, however, with our simple, almost Puritan, taste, this craze for personal finery on the part of our Dissenting brethren, is nothing less than an alarming sign of the times, not to say the thin end of the wedge.—The Church Times.

Ordinations

On July 17th, the 7th Sunday after Trinity, Bishop White, in Trinity cathedral, Michigan City, admitted to the sacred Order of Deacons, Mr. Josiah Otis Ward. The preacher and presenter was the Rev. Lawrence T. Cole, Ph.D., archdeacon of the diocese. Mr. Ward has been a student of the Western Theological Seminary, and his examination reflected great credit upon that institution as well as upon his own honest work.

Appeals

(Legal title [for use in making wills]: THE DOMESTIC AND FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY OF THE PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH IN THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.)

Domestic missions in seventeen missionary districts and forty-one home dioceses: missions among the colored people; missions among the Indians; foreign missions in China, Japan, Africa, Greece, and Haiti; support of the clergyman of this Church appointed to counsel and guide the presbyters and readers in Mexico.

Provision must be made for the salaries and traveling expenses of twenty-four bishops, and stipends of 1,700 missionary workers, besides the support of schools, orphanages, and hospitals. Contributions are, moreover, asked specifically for the salaries of workers and support of schools in Mexico. One thousand dollars per month is the estimate of such expenses.

Remittances should be made to MR. GEORGE C. THOMAS, treasurer, 281 Fourth ave., New York. At present, please address communications to the REV. JOSHUA KIMBER, associate secretary.

Spirit of Missions, official monthly magazine, $1 a year.

NEXT Ephphatha Sunday (Aug. 20th) rapidly approaches, with the usual reminder to parishes within the limits of the Mid-Western Deaf-Mute Mission that offerings are needed to meet its expenses.

The REV. A. W. MANN,
General Missionary, Gambier, Ohio.

THE Lake Superior copper country is on the boom. New mines are springing up on every hand, and the Church is offered a wonderful opportunity of winning souls for her Master. Two missionaries are to begin work in six of these new locations on Sept. 1st, and instead of being the last to enter the field, the Church is to be the first. We are able to promise each missionary six hundred dollars a year salary; but it is necessary that they should have houses in which to live, if they are to exist in a country where all the necessities of life are most expensive.

Five hundred dollars will build both houses, and we confidently appeal to the general Church for assistance in procuring homes for these men who are willing to sacrifice so much for Christ and His Church. Remittances should be sent to the BISHOP OF MARQUETTE, or to the Rev. J. E. CURZON, district presbyter of the Copper country, Houghton, Mich.

Hazy weather is thought to prognosticate frost in winter, snow in spring, fair weather in summer, and rain in autumn.

A SUBSCRIBER writes: "I was glad to see your protest against applying the word 'christening' to the ceremony of naming a vessel when it was launched; fancy, too, the idea of using it in connection with new clothing, and even animals! A few days ago, I asked a little girl the name of her pet cat. 'We kissed her Susan,' said the child, 'but we changed his name to Solomon, because he knew so much.' Though it may be a bit out of season to speak of it, does the sign 'Xmas' seem to carry with it quite the reverence we should have for the holy day and Name, as well as the joyous feeling almost everybody has for it as a holiday? In fact, does it not bring the blessed festival nearer what my own little child called it when, in writing to her grandma, she said they had recently had a 'hollerday'?"

A PREACHER in Omaha has been discoursing, as the papers report, on the ethics of sleeping in church. He is said to be very "progressive," and seems to have progressed so far that he is hard pushed for a subject. His congregation must also be far gone in the line of progress since they can do no better than go to sleep when their progressive pastor preaches. In his somnolent sermon he said:

I regard it as a compliment to my integrity, and indisputable evidence of confidence in the soundness of my theological views, to have prominent members of my congregation go to sleep in their seats, and thus rest during my discourse.

The text was about the young man who went to sleep while St. Paul was preaching, and fell out of the window and was killed. The Omaha preacher does not seem to have drawn the moral which the text suggests.

Pen-and-Ink-lings

IT is needless to say that the following bit of sarcastic pleasantry from Life does not apply to the management of our own Missionary Board: "I want to be sure," said the aged philanthropist, "that my money will, after my death, remain in this country where I made it, and the home of my adoption." "Have you thought of any way this can be fully assured?" inquired his lawyer. "I have," replied the philanthropist confidently. "I am going to leave it to a foreign missionary society."

THE debt of Columbia University, incurred in the removal of its site to Morningside Heights, says The Independent, is simply enormous, being $3,750,000, with an annual interest of $150,000, at four per cent., besides $800,000 current expenses. The annual expenditure would be a fine endowment for many a college, while the interest on the debt would run half a dozen colleges that are doing very useful work. The University will manage to get its debt paid by the same sort of generosity that has raised the money for Barnard College, the woman's adjunct to the University.

WE make our windows fit, we pad our doors, we shiver at a draft, we surround ourselves with woolen curtains, dusty carpets, and fluffy, luxurious upholstery; we breathe the same air over and over again, and then we wonder that we are not strong and vigorous, says London Hospital. The fact is, we are daily using up the exuberant vitality with which nature has provided us in struggling against artificial conditions. How powerful for evil, how deteriorating these conditions are, is shown by the fact that their mere removal gives back to the consumptive that vitality which enables him to overcome the seeds of disease within him. Fresh air is not a thing to be taken in little doses once a day, but a thing to live on.

THE Rev. George D. Grundy, vicar of Hey, near Oldham, England, has recently celebrated his sixtieth anniversary of his vicarage. He is ninety-two years old.

MR. JACOB A. RIIS, writing of the tenement house blight of New York, and of the wretched apologies for homes to be found therein, says:

Years ago, roaming through the British Museum, I came upon an exhibit that riveted my attention as nothing else had. It was a huge stone arm, torn from the shoulder of some rock image, with doubled fist and every rigid muscle instinct with angry menace. Where it came from, or what was its story, I do not know. I did not ask. It was its message to us I was trying to read. I had been spending weary days and nights in the slums of London, where hatred grew, a noxious crop, upon the wreck of the home. Lying there, mute and menacing, the great fist seemed to me like a shadow thrown from the gray dawn of the race into our busy day with a purpose, a grim, unheeded warning. What was it? In the slum the question haunts me yet. They perished—the empires those rock-hewers built, and the governments reared upon their ruins are long since dead and forgotten. They were born to die, for they were not built upon human happiness, but upon human terror and greed. We built ours upon the bed-rock, and its corner-stone is the home. With this bitter mockery of it that makes the slum, can it be that the warning is indeed for us?

IN the programme of a late ordination occurs the line: "Before benediction, collect for newly ordered deacon." Is the word collect there used, a noun or a verb?

IN such a building as the Congressional Library, it is especially interesting to find a room set apart for the use of the blind. It is a large square, forty-eight feet each way. Harmonious shades of pale blues, greens, and umbers are the colors of the decorations, and of the rugs on the floor. Deep window recesses let in abundant light and air. There are book shelves, screens, desks, chairs, and a grand piano which is a great source of delight to the sightless visitors. Upon one afternoon in each week an hour of music is given here by artists and singers who may happen to be in Washington. On other afternoons, the hour is devoted to reading aloud, and many men and women of national reputation have engaged in this labor of love. Books in raised characters, for the blind to read to themselves, are provided. Not least appreciated in this room are the flowers and plants which are kept there.

Notes From "Eaglesnest"

V.

SINCE writing that my eagles had disappeared, I have heard that one of them was shot, and the other soon left the scene of her bereavement. Mrs. Rushmore who has lived in the old mission house for more than twenty years, told me the sad story of the killing. The man with the gun—

"They are neither man nor woman,
They are neither brute nor human,
They are ghouls!"—

smote the noble bird in his flight, and brought him crippled into the water. Even then the brave eagle made a heroic battle for life. Several miles, with one wing broken, he struggled against wind and wave to reach the shore of the west bay, and there was another man with a gun who did him to death. I suppose he has been taxidermatized, and with hideous glass eyes is staring out of a glass case in some museum. If it had not been for the man with the gun, these emblems of American freedom and power would have been circling above our waters and winging the deep blue of our sky, perhaps for half a century. Out upon thee, thou slaughterer of beast and bird who have as good a right to live as thou, and perhaps are of more value to the world!

I have seen recently some comments of extravagant praise of a poem on "The Man with the Hoe." I read the poem a few months ago, but cannot get at it now. I remember there was above it Millet's picture of a man leaning on a hoe, looking rather tired; and the poem went on to say what a poor, degraded creature he was, and how he had been brought to his degraded condition by other people who ought to have treated him better, and not forced him to such a desperate condition that he would have to work with a hoe and lean on it when he had his picture taken. That is not exactly the way the story is told in the poem, but that is the gist of it.

I have not much sympathy for the man with a hoe. I have seen many a time when I gladly would exchange places with him; when I envied him his peaceful waking hours and nightly balm of restful sleep. What is the matter with the hoe? Does the poet think a gun is better? The hoe is one of the instruments of civilization; the weapon by which weeds are killed; one of the means of sustaining life, of feeding the world, of turning the wilderness into a garden. May I be worthy to have a hoe carved on my tombstone, if I die on shore! "The Man with a Hoe" should lift up his head, and not look so discouraged.

I remember seeing an old man working in his garden with a hoe, some fifty years ago. I was a lad then, not brought up to manual labor, but having an occasional spurt of it, which was painful. I felt very sorry for the old man with a hoe, and as he stopped for a minute to wipe the perspiration from his brow, I climbed up till I got my chin over the fence-top, and expressed my sympathy. "It must be awful hard for you," I said, "having to work in the hot sun. I wish you didn't have to work, don't you?" And what was my surprise at his answer, as he turned his kindly, smiling face upon me. "My boy," said he, "I am never happier than when I am at work. I love to work. You couldn't hire me to be idle." Love to work! The idea was new to me. I could scarcely believe the old man was in his right mind. Two things, at that period of my life, seemed to constitute happiness—not to be compelled to do anything, and not to have to obey anybody. Yet that was an absolutely wrong and harmful view of life! Employment and obedience are the great qualifiers of character, the first conditions of happiness in this world. How little the lad knew of the realities of the life just ahead of him; and how little the man knows of that which is soon to come to him! Well it shall be for both if they walk by faith and not by sight.

Augustin Daly's Bible

SINCE the death of Augustin Daly, some references have been made to his remarkable expanded copy of the Bible, but no account has been given—indeed it would be scarcely possible to give one—to show what a wonderful work it really is. The account which is here given is furnished by Henry Blackwell, to the New York Tribune, who mounted all the pages, arranged the plates, and bound the volumes.

Mr. Daly spent many years in collecting the plates which were to accompany, or rather, were chiefly to make up the work. He then turned them over to Mr. Blackwell to be arranged and bound. It was a tremendous piece of work, and while Mr. Blackwell was about it, Mr. Daly frequently sent him more plates, while the binder collected a considerable number himself. There were in the end about 8,000 plates, and in assorting and arranging these, Mr. Blackwell declares he spent no less than 1,800 hours before a beginning could be made with the actual binding. This took all of his spare time for two years.

In the course of his work he read the whole of the Bible through four times, and he thinks that when he got through he could have passed a good examination in theology. He arranged the plates by subjects, and when he found so many of a single subject that he did not care to place them all together, he scattered some of them about, placing them at passages containing more or less direct references to the subjects.

The next care was the text. The Douai version was used, and the edition was one printed in Dublin something over one hundred years ago. Two copies were used, because every page had to be mounted by itself on special paper, so that one side of each leaf was lost. Some of the pages were much soiled. In order to get them all cleaned, and uniformly so, Mr. Blackwell took the books all to pieces, and boiled the pages, just as a washer-woman would boil clothes. Then he hung them on the clothes line in the back yard, and sat smoking his pipe and watching them while they dried, the other members of his family, and the neighbors, being all the time filled with due horror at such treatment of a valuable book.

But the pages came through the process sound and clean, and then came the work of mounting them, and finally of binding. They were bound into forty-two volumes, in half white levant, with vellum sides. Sometimes there is a considerable amount of text in a volume, and sometimes there is extremely little, according to how many plates have to accompany it. The Gospel of Matthew, for instance, takes three or four volumes, and the Lord's Prayer alone takes a whole volume. This volume, of course, contains only one leaf of the regular text of the book, but it also contains the prayer in 150 languages, besides the many plates.

Each of the volumes has a title page with a water color drawing by Eugene Grivaz. Mr. Blackwell estimates that the whole work must have cost Mr. Daly not less than $25,000.

Book Reviews and Notices

The Case for Incense. Submitted to his Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury on behalf of the Rev. H. Westall. New York: Longmans, Green & Co. Pp. 173. Price, $1.

This celebrated case is exciting widespread interest, and is no doubt one of the critical phases of the Oxford Movement which has been going on for the past fifty years. It is indeed strange that of the six points of ritual which have been contended for, the last one to win popular approval is the one which has the most solid basis of Scriptural and ecclesiastical authority, and which has been most free from abuse in the past. While all the others have been widely adopted, there are as yet only three hundred parishes in England in which incense is used. It is high time that the pros and cons of the argument as to the use of incense should be brought before the public. In this volume, which contains the arguments and evidence submitted to his Grace of Canterbury, we have an abler and fuller presentation of the grounds for the use of incense in the Church of England than has ever been given to the world before. We think that the friends of incense have made out a very strong case, and we do not see how the major part of their contention can be disproved or denied. The legal aspects of the case are very clearly brought out, both by Mr. Westall and his lawyers, and they are very interesting reading. But the main interest of the volume lies in the opinions of the experts called in to testify. These embody a large amount of valuable information which has not before been easily accessible. Their testimony covers the following points: "Early History of the Use of Incense," the Rev. W. H. Frere; "Its Use in the Orthodox Eastern Church," W. J. Birkbeck; "Theological Value of Incense," Dr. H. R. Percival and the Rev. Darwell Stone; "Evidential Value of the Rubrics," the Rev. E. Geldart; "Use of the Censer," the Rev. T. A. Lacey; "The Edwardian Inventories," W. H. St. John Hope; "Post-Reformation Use," the Rev. W. H. Frere; "Incense under the Prayer Book of 1549," the Rev. T. A. Lacey. These articles constitute an exhaustive treatment of the whole question. We recommend a careful study of them by all intelligent Churchmen, lay and clerical, and an honest effort to digest and weigh the mass of learned evidence which they present. This is one of the burning questions of the day, on which all thoughtful people ought to be well informed.

The Rights of the Church of England Under the Reformation Settlement. A Letter to the Lord Bishop of Winchester. By Viscount Halifax. New York: Longmans, Green & Co. Pp. 62. Price, 50 cts.

In this brief volume that splendid Churchman, Lord Halifax, who, at the head of the English Church Union, is battling so valiantly for the ancient rights and liberties of our Mother Church, has stated, in their clearest and most convincing form, the grounds upon which he and his followers take their stand. He contends that the character of the existing courts for the decision of spiritual matters is not only inconsistent with, but directly contradicts, the arrangements contemplated by the Reformation Statutes which provided that spiritual cases should be decided by spiritual persons. To this fundamental principle he urges an immediate and full return, claiming for the Established Church of England a degree of liberty equal to that which has always been granted to the Church of Scotland. It is difficult to see how a claim so just as that which he expresses in the following words can for a moment be denied: "All matters affecting the doctrine of the Church, the administration of the sacraments, and the worship of the Church, shall be decided by the Church herself. No Christian can be content to see the authority given by Christ to the episcopate left in the hands of a committee of lawyers. The Church cannot surrender her rights in such matters. If at any time her officers have professed to surrender them, it was an act on their part ultra vires." These are the immutable principles for which Lord Halifax and the E. C. U. are contending. It seems passing strange to us in America that they should ever have been surrendered or withheld. Every wisely directed effort toward their re-establishment must command our most hearty sympathy.

The Jacksonian Epoch. By Charles H. Peck. New York: Harper & Bros. 1899. Price, $2.50.

The period covered by this book, from the battle of New Orleans to the succession of Mr. Tyler to the presidency, brings before us some of the most striking situations and distinguished men which our country has seen. There is a dramatic interest through it all. "Old Hickory" lives again; Henry Clay speaks to us and we feel his personality; the Harrison Campaign with its log cabin, its coon, and its hard cider, all are there. The book is rich in its pen portraits of the men of the times, and also in its masterly analysis of the stirring events which then took place. This readable volume will be found an admirable help in securing a vivid impression of the men and movements which made the Jacksonian Epoch a pivotal period in the history of the United States. It will fasten in one's memory the very semblance of the times, and make the politicians and the patriots of the past, for us, living creatures. One cannot but smile a little after perusal of the book, at the din and turmoil of those days, and the disasters prognosticated, now all past and over. It will help one to look more calmly at all sorts of complications in the present, which will as surely have their solution, and will also, in their turn, pass away.

The Sixth Sense, and Other Stories. By Margaret Sutton Briscoe. New York: Harper & Bros. Price, $1.25.

The story which gives the title to this collection of short tales is charmingly original. It has all the subtle inner feeling of Hawthorne, and deals with the mysterious power of love to awaken a soul to its full consciousness, and the plenitude of its powers. On the background of a soldier's life, and his supposed death on the field of Gettysburg, is woven the romance of a young girl, unloved and lonely, who allows the bereaved mother and sister of the hero to believe that she was engaged to him. She is folded in tenderest sympathy to the hearts of the bereaved. She comes to live with them. She wears the weeds of a widow, and the whole community accepts the situation. A new world of love and sympathy is opened up to her, though the very horror of her situation, based upon a lie, gives to her an uneasiness at times, when she would fain confess all. But these very perturbations are taken as tenderest assurance of the reality of her loss, and how truly she is one with mother and daughter in their common loss. At last the son returns. He was picked up from the battlefield. He raved in fever. He forgot his name, and it was not until the prison pen had opened before him, at the close of the war, that he rallied sufficiently to seek once more his home. Then the dénouement takes place, and there are few scenes in fiction stronger and more dramatic than that in which she makes her confession to the soldier, returned from the dead to expose her lie. Through all the powerful scene, one sees how in her, though through her lie, the "Sixth Sense" of womanly love has been aroused, and that she has been ennobled in the process. As is fitting, in all love dramas, happiness comes to both, and "all ends well." There are eight other stories, also well worth reading.

Children's Ways. Being Selections from the Author's "Studies of Childhood," with some Additional Matter. By James Sully. New York: D. Appleton & Co. Price, $1.25.

Nursery Ethics. Second Edition. Price, $1.

From the Child's Standpoint. Views of Child Life and Nature. A Book for Parents and Teachers. By Florence Hull Winterburn. New York: The Baker & Taylor Company. Price, $1.25.

We wonder sometimes how children ever succeeded in growing up to a useful maturity in the days when so little was known and said about them. We must at least admit that the children of this generation ought to excel all that have lived before, for there were never so much time and talent expended in studying their nature and needs and ways, as now. They are weighed and measured and watched and tabulated at every stage of physical and mental development. They are analyzed and classified, and dissected and described, with microscopical minuteness. Professor Sully's "Studies of Childhood," which attracted much attention a few years ago, was a valuable collection of material, to which thousands of observers contributed, and in which thousands of readers have been interested. It classified the phenomena of child-life, mainly as indicating the process of intellectual development, and was illustrated by many child stories. The "Children's Ways," noted in the title above, is an abridgment of the larger and more psychological work, adapted in style to the general reader.

Mrs. Winterburn's books are not at all "scientific," but they are eminently sensible, and all the more refreshing and helpful because they are evolved from sympathetic insight, rather than observation and analysis. We may doubtless learn something from the latter method, but the former has served the world well all through the ages. It is fortunate for humanity that a kind Providence has not made education and development to depend altogether on science. But teachers and parents, especially those who are young, should be thankful for the suggestions of wise and practical women, like the writer above noted, from whom they may learn in an hour what may save them from mistakes which will perhaps unhappily affect the entire lives of children committed to their care. "From the Child's Standpoint," relates to the instincts, ideas, and temperament of childhood. The writer does not tell us of exterior signs of these, but shows us the very heart and inner life of the young child. In "Nursery Ethics," as the title implies, she vindicates the rights of children to be treated according to their nature, and warns against the blunders and abuses to which they are subjected through ignorance, custom, and unsympathetic temper. This book is exceedingly valuable to all who have any relation to young children; it cannot be commended too highly.

The Student's Life of Paul. By George Holley Gilbert, Ph.D., D.D., Professor of New Testament Literature and Interpretation in Chicago Theological Seminary. New York: The Macmillan Company. 1899.

The aim of the author is first to present a life of the great Apostle to the Gentiles, "entirely apart from a study of his theological teachings, which has not hitherto been done"; and, we may add, Prof. Gilbert does not altogether succeed in doing it, either. Secondly, the author endeavors to present the facts in as simple and scientific a manner as possible; and, thirdly, to present the material in an accessible and usable form. We are glad to say that the objects sought are, in the main, successfully attained. The critical work is close and searching, if not always pervaded by that reverent spirit towards the sources, and especially the Acts, which we should prefer to see. There are a great many instances of this free treatment of St. Luke's writings, and even of St. Paul's, that might be noticed, but en bono? It is the fashion of the school to which the author belongs, and the fashion will pass. In other respects this study of St. Paul's life and work possesses decided merits. As a study of the facts of St. Paul's work, his movements from place to place, his connection with others, and the scenes of his many labors, it is clear and concise, well thought out, and always interesting, if not always convincing. Three appendices, on "The Sources," "The Chronology of St. Paul's Life," and the vexatious question of "The Churches of Galatia," are not the least valuable portion of the work. The author is "up to date" with the leading German critics in admitting the Epistles ascribed to St. St. Paul, even "certain parts" of the Pastoral Epistles. This is quite encouraging. We may be able to save the whole of our New Testament after all, when the great critics have finished crying Peccavi. Prof. Gilbert agrees with Bishop Lightfoot and other eminent scholars in supporting the North Galatian theory, that the Galatian Churches were in Galatia proper.

Scripture Worthies: Their Characters Viewed in a New Light. By the Rev. P. Spencer Whitman, D.D. Chicago and New York: Fleming H. Revell Company.

What is the special new light in which the author views the Scripture worthies of whom he writes, we have failed to discover. Some of his conclusions seem to us very far-fetched, and in no case is there any light shed on the characters, that is unfamiliar to Churchmen who have been taught to see in the Old Testament foreshadowings of the New. We therefore find nothing in this book deserving of any special commendation, while there is much that stamps it with mediocrity.

INQUIRY is made by "a grateful reader" as to an edition of Little's "Reasons for Being a Churchman," that is less expensive than "the two-dollar one." There is no two-dollar edition. The cloth bound volume is sold for one dollar, and there is an edition in paper covers selling for fifty cents. "I cannot think of any book," our correspondent says, "that is more interesting and instructive in Church doctrines. Let us have a less expensive edition that can be more widely circulated." Address the Young Churchman Company, Milwaukee.

Opinions of the Press

Christian Intelligencer (Ref.)

REFORM THE SUNDAY SCHOOL.—The severe indictment and condemnation of the Sunday school by the Rev. Pelham Williams, D.D., of Greenbush, Mass., has done a service to the Sunday school cause, in directing attention to some of the defects and weaknesses of the institution. Few, if any, we imagine, will be inclined to follow the lead of Dr. Williams in seeking the abolition of the Sunday school, or go to the length he has in condemnation of it. In fact, the defects and failures of the Sunday school so trenchantly and unqualifiedly presented by Dr. Williams are an argument, not for the abandonment of the institution, but for its improvement. There is no doubt that the Sunday school, despite the excellent work done and the magnificent results achieved, has in some cases been allowed to usurp unduly the place of the Church, and been an excuse for the neglect of parental instruction. It is well to have attention called to these things, and in so far Dr. Williams has done a far-from-harmful service by his iconoclastic assault. The result will be most healthful if it leads to greater care in the selection of teachers, the employment of only such as are competent, the explosion of the idea that the Sunday school is "the children's Church," the causing of parents and teachers to emphasize the paramount importance of church attendance for children as for adults, the revival of religious instruction in the home, and the relegation of the Sunday school to its true place as the supplement, and not the substitute, for religious instruction by parents.

A FOOLISH EXPERIMENT.—An experiment has lately been tried in one of the public schools of Milwaukee, and by its opponents pronounced a failure. The aim of its originator, Mr. R. J. O'Hanlon, was this—to introduce into the school life of the child a form of training which would equip him for the duties of citizenship on his entrance into the world of grown-up men and women. A form of government was therefore introduced into the school, which was modeled upon that existing in the city of Milwaukee itself. A mayor was appointed, aldermen were elected, a constitution adopted. There were judges, policemen, comptrollers, and no end of other officers. The best principles of the best governed were laid down, and the boys and girls—there were no distinctions of sex—were set about governing themselves. But the amount of chaos and corruption that ensued brought protests from the parents, and even the scholars themselves. Studies were neglected, and bribes given and taken. Instead of a lesson of self-government being acquired, all the evils of the most corrupt form of municipal government were practiced. Mr. O'Hanlon, not discouraged, says that only the prejudices of a community were against him; that, given a longer time, his system would have proved itself. "It is the height of absurdity," he says, "to make the school an autocracy, and to substitute an external conscience for the right of self-control." But, with votes bought and sold for peanuts and pennies, the parents cried halt—time enough to learn how bad municipal government might be when necessity for action confronted him!

The Household

A Changed Parish

BY CHARLOTTE WHITCOMB

"Of course we must attend church in the city," said Mrs. Macy.

"Of course," assented Mr. Macy.

"It will make Sunday a day of work, instead of a day of rest, to rise early enough to get the children ready and get to church in time. It is an hour's ride on the street car, is it not?"

"Forty-five minutes, unless there are accidents or other hindrances."

"The children can only occasionally attend vespers, and none of us will be able to attend early Communion."

After a thoughtful pause, Mr. Macy said: "I'm afraid we made a mistake settling in this suburb, Mary; if we did, it is not too late yet to rectify the mistake."

"But this roomy house, and the large grounds and the pure air are so desirable for Daisy, John. We shall not mind the effort to get to church when we get used to it. I think it will be rather pleasant in the summer. We can so often drive up there, too."

"On the other hand, we must miss many services, especially during Lent," said Mr. Macy. "However, now that we are here, perhaps we would better make the best of it. A year of it may be a good discipline for us."

Mr. and Mrs. Macy, with their two children, Philip, a boy of sixteen years, and Daisy, a delicate girl of seven, had come from a large, western cathedral city, and taken up a residence in a suburban village in Eastern Minnesota. Matters of business had forced the removal on Mr. Macy, but as it had seemed to be only a change from one pleasant city to another, it had not been regarded as a hardship.

On their arrival they had found it impossible to find a house in town to suit them, except at an enormous rent, and when this beautiful place in Riverton was offered them at a rental quite within their means, it appealed so strongly to Mrs. Macy, she urged her husband to take it.

They came on a Monday, and the following Saturday found them comfortably settled, and Sunday they had attended service in the picturesque little chapel of St. John's, a few blocks from their new home.

It was cold weather in Minnesota. The thermometer marked 20 degrees below zero, but the sun was so dazzlingly bright, the sky so blue, and the snow so pure and sparkling, that the world of Riverton seemed very beautiful to the Macys who, warmly clad, and thoroughly comfortable from their well-heated and well-ventilated house, enjoyed the walk and the day.

Arrived at the chapel, there was only a narrow footpath through the snow from the street to the door. Inside, two or three people, the only arrivals, stood over the registers, as the place was very cold. The officiating clergyman who lived in the city, had not yet appeared. Everything had an untidy, neglected look. Tattered books and hymnals littered the pews, the aisles needed sweeping, and everything was dusty.

After waiting fifteen minutes in the cold for the opening of service, Mrs. Macy became concerned for Daisy who sat shivering by her side, and sent her home with Philip, resolved to stay herself to see what the prospects were for a Church home here for herself and family.

The clergyman, a discouraged-looking man, preached a good sermon, though he evidently suffered from the cold. People dropped in until, as Mr. Macy found by actual count, there were forty present. The first chant was read, but later a lady appeared, and led the few faltering voices with the organ. At the close of the service, the rector announced that owing to the inclemency of the weather, and because there were so few children present, there would be no session of the Sunday school. Then the people, except two or three who waited to speak to the rector, hurried out of the vault-like building and away.

The conversation recorded took place between Mr. and Mrs. Macy on their return home. That very evening the elders of the family attended service in the city and returned, having enjoyed the ride on the warmed and lighted car, and congratulating themselves that they were not, after all, out of humanity's reach.

A month passed. The young Macys found themselves quite at home in the city Sunday school; Philip went up every day also to school with a crowd of Riverton boys and girls, there being no high school in the village. Being detained one day by errands, he found himself returning without any of his schoolmates, and seated in the street car just behind two university students from Riverton whom he knew slightly, but esteemed highly as earnest, manly young fellows. They were both members of a flourishing denominational church in Riverton, and were discussing Christian Endeavor work.

Said one: "It seems a pity that now the Episcopal church is closed, all those children are not attending Sunday school anywhere. It seems to me we ought to extend an invitation to them to come into our church for this winter; they can return to their own when it re-opens."

"I doubt," was the answer, "if their church re-opens. It was all they could do to keep going last summer before the Grays left, and now this new family, the Macys, are going up town, they have given up discouraged."

"I wonder at so many of them going up town. If they'd all stay and work together, they'd be all right."

"Well, it looks as if they were an ease-loving lot. They would rather go up town to an elegant church, 'cushioned and cosy and warm,' than to take hold and make this chapel a home for themselves and the many unable to go to the city."

"My! but what a chance for some one with the real Christian Endeavor spirit. That young Macy now! A little of the spirit of helpfulness and of giving, instead of selfishly getting and keeping!"

Philip could not endure hearing any more. With heightened color and a very erect carriage, he rose and left the car ahead of the young men. When he arrived at home his father and mother had not left the luncheon table. Philip had been more than annoyed at the freely expressed opinions of the young men. He had never before heard his family or his Church criticised, and with a deep sense of injury he repeated to his parents what he had unwillingly overheard.

To his surprise, neither his father nor mother seemed indignant. His father said: "Maybe they are right. They should know the situation, as they live here."

Said Mrs. Macy: "I hope they are right. I should rejoice if we might have an active church and good service here. It would be so much better for us all."

That afternoon Mrs. Macy went on a round of calls, returning similar courtesies received from her new neighbors. At dinner she said:

"I was surprised to find so many Church people. They tell me there are between thirty and forty families of communicants here, but like ourselves, all who are able go to the city to church."

"No wonder they cannot have a resident rector and a well-kept church" said Mr. Macy, "all the available funds go to town! But," continued he, "I have a bit of news, too, good news, I think. The chapel here has been closed for two Sundays, through the rector's having taken another charge. But the Bishop has appointed a young man in Deacons' Orders to come here and keep the church open a month, and to look the situation over, and see what can be done. The part that is specially good news is that the young man in Deacons' Orders is Philip's old high school teacher, Mr. Holland."

Philip cried: "Hooray! Good! Good!" while Mr. Macy said: "And he is to come so as to be here next Sunday."

"We must entertain him here!" said Mrs. Macy.

"And the church must be made at least habitably warm and decently clean," said Philip. "I will see what I can do towards making it so."

Clad in overalls and armed with a snow shovel, Saturday morning saw Philip hard at work. A clean-cut wide path was made from the street to the church door. The help of two other boys was secured, and the building was thoroughly swept and dusted, the litter cleared away, and everything put in order. Mr. Macy carried over an abundance of fuel, and a good fire was kept up all day Saturday and during Saturday night. Sunday morning saw the little chapel clean, warm, and inviting.

Allen Leonard, a talented young musician, was persuaded to play the organ, and though the singing by the choir was timid and faint, it was supplemented by such a volume of sound from the pews that it seemed as if the Scriptural injunction, "Let all the people praise Thee," was fully observed, for, strange to say, the pews were pretty well filled.

Whether it was because the Bishop was to be there, or the news had spread that a resident rector would begin his services, or the unwonted bustle about the chapel Saturday had awakened curiosity, no one could say, but almost all the communicants in the village were out to church; they were quite all out to the parish meeting, which was held the next evening, when, with the Bishop's advice and assistance, ways and means were discussed, pledges were made by the city-going people to remain at home, and by all to try what faithfulness and devotion to their own home church would accomplish.

The Bishop afterward said of this meeting that it stood apart in his memory as a parish meeting apparently quite free from the self-seeking, place-making spirit. Those who had been attending service elsewhere seemed so conscious of having neglected their duty, they insisted on the old officers keeping their places, promising to assist in every way, and the few who had borne the burden until discouraged, were so glad and grateful for help, that they were ready to take hold with renewed vigor, or to give up to new hands.

Of course with such a beginning it is easy to foresee the progress. Mr. Holland settled in Riverton and remained after he was made a priest, and proved, as almost any clergyman does who has the support and confidence of his people, the right man in the right place.

About two years later, Philip Macy who had become a student at the State University, was invited by one of the young men who had discussed him in the street car, to attend a "Christian Endeavor Rally," with any of the members of St. John's church who were interested in Christian Endeavor work.

Phillip's reply explained the situation exactly when he said: "If I should bring those who are interested in Christian endeavor work, the entire church would come, for we are a Christian endeavor parish. We have so many endeavor rallies of our own to attend, in our guild meetings, choir rehearsals, pastoral aid meetings, St. Andrew's Brotherhood, benevolences, parish visiting, social meetings, missionary meetings, and Sunday school study evenings, that it would be impossible to find an hour when those interested in Christian endeavor work would all be disengaged."

A LADY who adored a certain preacher took the late Archbishop Magee to hear him. "Oh, what a saint in the pulpit!" said the lady, as they were going home. "And, oh, what a martyr in the pew!" added the Archbishop.

The Canonical Church Register

Compiled with Reference to the Canons of the Church in the United States of America.

There has long been needed a Parish Register which could be supplied to small parishes and missions at a low price.

The Young Churchman Co. has now supplied that deficiency, and has placed on the market a beautiful book, handsomely ruled, high grade of paper, the best of binding, and more room in it than could heretofore be had in any book costing five dollars. The price of this book is only $2.75. Larger editions, for the large parishes, are also made at corresponding Prices.

This book was made at the suggestion of the Bishop of Western Michigan, who keenly felt the necessity, as have all other Bishops. We submitted a copy to Bishop Gillespie, and received the following letter:

EPISCOPAL RESIDENCE, Grand Rapids, Mich.

Dear Sirs:

I am exceedingly pleased with your Parish Register. You have met a great want admirably. I shall do all in my power to get our small Parishes and Missions to secure them.

You have made the price much lower than I had supposed such a book could be produced for.

Yours very truly,

GEO. D. GILLESPIE.

The Missionary Bishop of South Dakota had also desired such a book, and wrote as follows.

I have received the Parish Register, which strikes me as capital. In price, arrangement, and general appearance, it is a great achievement. You have made us all your debtors.

Yours very truly,

W. H. HARE.

CHAPTER XVI.

A GUEST IN THE LITTLE GREEN HOUSE

IT was dark in the little house when Tony came in from work, and he tiptoed softly across the kitchen floor, lit a lamp, and then went to the lounge. Mrs. Ferrall was fast asleep, and he passed on to the sitting-room, and whispered, "Madge."

There was no reply, and a look of disappointment came over his face. It was so late that he had thought surely she would be home by now, but he started to work getting supper with a will. The fire was bright, the tea kettle bubbling itself into a rage, and the table set, when he went for about the tenth time to take a look for Madge out of the side window. The latter commanded a fine view of the long bridge, but to-night it was so dark and snowy outside he could not see very far.

He had heard the trains go by fully ten minutes before, and it did seem queer that Madge should loiter so Thanksgiving Eve when she knew how much she was needed at home.

All at once he caught sight of figures, a dark, straggling mass, moving from the direction of the bridge. He shaded his eyes, and pressed his face against the pane to see who they were. Not the girls; no, there were too many of them. It looked as though they were carrying some one. Like a flash came the dread of a certain possibility. He paused irresolutely, trying to drive the dread back, when suddenly there was a quick, light tap on the front door, and his heart seemed to leap into his mouth. Madge must be hurt. He passed the sleeping figure on the lounge again, and with fingers that would tremble in spite of himself, opened the door.

"It's only me," Laura said softly, her eyes bright with excitement. "The girls were on the bridge when the trains passed—"

"Is that Madge they're bringing?" Tony asked, his big eyes wide and staring.

"No, no; it's Virginia—Virginia Hardy, you know her," Laura reassured him. "She fainted, and Madge said to bring her here."

Tony never said a word as he turned back into the house, only there was a queer, happy little smile on his face, and his heart felt like a balloon, now that the weight was gone.

So it happened that Virginia was brought as a guest to the little green house, and laid in state on Madge's white bed, in the cosy little chamber off the sitting-room, while its owner went out to the kitchen and showed herself as a living, breathing girl to the anxious mother.

By the time Virginia had regained consciousness, Tony was speeding up town on a double mission: First, to find Dr. Sanford, and send him to the relief of Madge; and, second, to let the Hardys know of Virginia's condition. Both were well fulfilled, and when Mr. Hardy and he drove up to the little green house in the big covered carriage, Dr. Sanford's old gray horse and buggy were there already.

It was an interested group who stood around Mollie while she told the story of those perilous moments on the bridge, and Mr. Hardy's arm was clasped closely around Virginia, and his face paled at the thought of how nearly he had come to losing her. "And then I found the girls, and it was all over," Mollie concluded, and while the others clustered around her with eager queries, Mr. Hardy went quietly over to the lounge where the little heroine lay. No one, save he and Madge, knew what he said, but when he left her to go back to Virginia, there was a glad look on the little oval face that made it almost beautiful.

Dr. Sanford had been bending over the couch, too, touching her wounded arm with light, deft fingers. She did not wince at the pain or cry; only a tremor ran over the slim little form, and she closed her lips tighter.

"And what about this young lady?" he asked, with a twinkle in his dark, merry eyes. "How did she fracture her arm and bruise it like this?"

"Why, I don't know," Mollie exclaimed. "I didn't know it was as bad as that, Dr. Sanford. Madge didn't cry."

"Didn't she?" repeated the doctor dryly. "Well, it is. Tell us how it happened, Madge?"

Madge gave a startled glance at the circle of faces around her, and flushed hotly. She was not used to the role of heroine and being the centre of attraction. "There isn't anything to tell," she said falteringly. "I just happened to see that Virginia's fur cloak was lying half on the ties, and I was afraid it would catch in the wheels, and draw her under, too, so I put out my hand to pull it back, and the train came, and something hit my arm, and—and that's all."

"The iron steps just about came low enough to strike the forearm between the wrist and elbow," Dr. Sanford said gravely to Mr. Hardy, and Tony who was next to Madge, bent his head, and kissed her right then and there before all the girls.

"The sooner you girls get home and cool down, the better," continued the doctor, "or I'll have the whole Sisterhood down with nervous prostration; and, besides, Madge must be quiet."

Full of anxious solicitude now and loving sympathy for her whom they had so lately decried as unworthy to be a St. Dorothy girl, Evelyn and Virginia clustered about the couch with the other girls to say good-night to Madge. Virginia was the last, and as she bent over to kiss Madge, the latter saw the tears in her blue eyes. She did not speak, but there was more conveyed in her kiss and handclasp than in the others' words.

"Room for all of you in the carriage," Mr. Hardy said. "Mollie, you and Evelyn take Virginia on the back seat and keep her warm between you, and these two little ones can

Dr. Sanford paused as he was stepping into his buggy, and there was a brief, low-toned consultation between the two gentle men. The girls did not know the import of it then, but when Mollie heard the last words, by accident, as Mr. Hardy turned away, she thought she understood their drift, and was happy over them for the sake of her favorite.

At the Vaughan Teachers' Rest

BY ABBY STUART MARSH

THE fee charged, large or small though it may be, never covers the faithful physician's services. For his is the earnest and untiring effort to keep abreast with the discoveries of science and the progress of the day; his is the self-sacrificing disregard of seasons and hours; and his is the untiring patience with poor, human nature at its weakest and frailest.

Even so, be the salary large or small, the work of the earnest teacher can never be fully repaid. Love and heart work cannot be bought and sold; and the true teacher, aside from her often expensive technical education, and the natural aptitude requisite for imparting knowledge, must put of herself, heart and soul, into her work. Unlimited patience, untiring vigilance, and an unflinching attention to details, must be hers. And beyond all this, she must be able to love not only young life and child life in the abstract, with its "trailing clouds of glory," but she must be able to love individual children, and sometimes unattractive children; and so to love them, as to teach them to make themselves attractive. Truly she must love and work as in His Name who, himself becoming a child, hal lowed all child life, or her work will be in vain. Then, too, and perhaps hardest of all, she must be herself, just as far as possible, what she would have her charges become. Were it to-day necessary, would not these thoughts explain the need and existence of a teachers' rest?

Thirty-four miles from New York, on the west bank of the Hudson, between West Point and Haverstraw, is such a "Rest," truly what its name implies; home accommodations for twenty or more teachers. Comfortable rooms, a pleasant parlor, and a dining-room cool even in the heated season, are here to be found. The daily papers, new books, and magazines, with shaded porches, easy chairs, hammocks, and a summer house, make reading a delight to the tired teacher whose association with books during the school year is often an upright and correct attitude both for herself and her pupils.

There is the original house, a two-story, rambling cottage, and the Comstock cottage, built through a legacy from Miss Louise Comstock, in this way the largest contributor to the "Rest." These are surrounded by two or three acres of fruit and shade trees, lawns and flowers. In the freshness of a June day, the place is very beautiful; the song of the birds in the intervals of their nibbles at the ripening cherries, the sweet perfume of the rose and the syringa, the fine views of the placid Hudson and its well-wooded banks, with a soft background of distant mountains, make a charming whole. Here is the liberty and freedom of a cultured home, with only the simple regulations which good taste and refinement suggest for the comfort of all.

The "Rest," a memorial of Dr. Vaughan, principal for a time of the Episcopal Female Institute of Philadelphia, has been in existence since 1875, and has most acceptably carried on its work of furnishing rest and refreshment to tired teachers. One of the best testimonies to the success of the work is that many of the guests return from year to year. Suggested by the hospitality of Dr. and Mrs. Vaughan to temporarily-disabled teachers, the work is the beautiful outcome of a kindly thought which, like a pebble, sank deep in the waters, while the circles made by the motion go on ever widening and widening. Incorporated in 1880, that the property acquired at first through the generous aid of Madame Clement and her daughter, might never be alienated from its purpose, "the Rest" has the imprimature of the Church, Bishop Potter being visitor, Mrs. A. T. Twing, president, and Miss Clement, secretary and treasurer of the board of managers.

Like the doors of the Church, the Rest is open to ladies of all forms of the Christian Faith. The thought is that it shall never outgrow the dimensions of a home, and yet that it shall afford rest and shelter to as many as possible.

The surrounding country, with its historic associations and beautiful landscape views, is exceedingly interesting, and many a pleasant drive can be enjoyed in the comfortable family carriage. West Point, with its many interests, past and present, in the life of our country, is but ten miles distant, and can be easily made the objective point of a day's excursion. The "Treason House," recalling Major Andre's sad fate, was pointed out on our first drive. Indeed there are many quaint objects of interest near at hand—the Italians at work in the quarry at the Cove; the white sails on the river; and in the evening, the lighted steamers plying their way to and from the city, flashing lights upon either shore, call the family to the porch as they pass. For those who enjoy the quiet comforts and pleasures of a refined home, I can scarcely imagine a more pleasant retreat.

It may seem strange that this beautiful work has been advertised so little, and that it is not more widely known. Its patronage has come by one well-pleased occupant telling another, and teachers and their friends coming again and again. Before and after the days of school vacations, and for longer and longer periods each year, the Rest is open to other ladies needing such quiet refreshment, that the hospitable thought from which it grew, may, planted as a tiny seed, bear beautiful fruit for the blessing and healing of those who work in the vineyard of the Master.

WHAT THEY ARE.

Composition of the Famous New Food.

A wide-spread interest has been created among good liver as to the composition of Grape-Nuts, the new food that has come into popular use of late. It has long been known to physicians, chemists, and food experts that the starchy portion of entire wheat flour and barley is transformed into a true and very choice sugar by the act of intestinal digestion in the human body. This sugar is identical with, and is known as, grape-sugar, and it is in condition for immediate transformation into blood and the necessary structure from which the delicate nerve centres are built up.

A food expert of the Postum Cereal Co., Lim., Battle Creek, Mich., followed a line of experiments until he produced the food called Grape-Nuts, of which grape-sugar forms the principal part, and it is produced by following out Nature's processes in a mechanical way. That is, heat, moisture, and time are the methods employed and directed by scientific facts gained in research.

Grape-Nuts are probably entitled to the claim to be the most perfectly adapted food for human needs now extant. Certain it is that the user's delight in the flavor and the perfect action of intestinal digestion during the use of Grape-Nuts is satisfying, and the added strength of body confirms the fact.

The Trade in Flour

THE millers of the United States, like its manufacturers generally, have made their banner record in the fiscal year 1899. While wheat, corn, oats, cornmeal, oatmeal, rye, and, in fact, all lines of breadstuffs, show a reduction in exportation, by reason of the decreased demand abroad, flour alone shows an increase, and not only an increase, but reaches the highest point in the history of flour exportation. For the fiscal year, the total exportation of flour is over 18,000,000 barrels, representing over 80,000,000 bushels of wheat, while no preceding year in the history of our exportation shows as great an exportation of flour. While flour is not included with manufactures in the general classification of the Treasury Bureau of Statistics, being retained under the general term, "breadstuffs," the fact that American labor and the results of American enterprise enter into its transition from wheat to flour, and thus prove advantageous to labor and business enterprise, adds to the satisfaction with which Americans will note the steady growth in the exportation of flour, even in the face of the reduced demand abroad for breadstuffs. The shortage in breadstuffs in other parts of the world in 1897 and 1898 caused, as is well known, a general advance in prices, and the better crops of the year just passed resulted in lower prices and less demand for our breadstuffs. This fact accounts for the reduction in our exportation in other lines of breadstuffs, and that flour exports should have continued to increase, in the face of the reduction in other lines, is especially gratifying to those interested in seeing American labor participate as largely as possible in the profits of American exportations.

The average price per bushel of wheat exported during the fiscal year 1899, was 74.77c., and the average price per bushel for the wheat exported in the form of flour, was 87.67c., calculating that $4\frac{1}{2}$ bushels of wheat are utilized in the production of a barrel of flour. This adds 12.9c. to the amount of money received for each bushel of wheat sent abroad in this form, thus bringing to American industry over \$10,000,000 during the year, as a compensation to the enterprise which transformed the 80,000,000 bushels of grain into the 18,000,000 barrels of flour exported.

While there is a gratifying increase in the exportation of flour in every direction, the most strongly marked growth is toward the Orient. The exportations of flour to Hongkong in the year 1899 will considerably exceed 1,000,000 barrels, while in 1889 the number was but 378,634. Flour for Hongkong goes mostly to China, though considerable quantities are shipped direct from Hongkong to Japan, the Philippines, and various islands of Oceania. To Japan direct our exports of flour have grown from 19,677 barrels in 1889, to about 225,000 in 1899; to all Asia, from 418,353 barrels in 1889 to about 1,750,000 barrels in 1899. To South America the growth has been less rapid, the total for 1889 being 1,068,167 barrels, while that for 1899 will be but a little more than the figure of a decade ago. Germany, to which we sent but 13,009 barrels of flour in 1889, takes in 1899 nearly 500,000 barrels, this being a large increase over last year. Netherlands, to which we sent but 92,260 barrels in 1889, took, in 1898, over 1,000,000 barrels, the figures for 1899 not being yet completed. To the United Kingdom our exports of flour in 1889 were 5,271,244 barrels, and in 1899 will exceed 10,000,000 barrels.

Hints for Flower Lovers
HOW TO KEEP CUT FLOWERS.—It is often hard to get flowers, but when obtained it is still more difficult to keep them in a satisfactory condition. To arrange them tastefully and effectively requires time and thought. The immediate removal of one fading flower will often preserve the others. Every morning flowers are taken from the vases and, beginning with the stems, refreshed by a bath of pure water—two or three minutes being long enough for the immersion—then taken out and sprinkled lightly with the hand. The water should be changed every day, and the water used for sprinkling must be fresh and pure.

Sunshine resting on cut flowers is very injurious, and the room in which they are kept should be cold rather than warm. Gas saps the very life of delicate blossoms, and a bell-glass placed over them at night will be found an excellent protector.

But measures for the preservation of flowers should be taken before they reach the house. There is a great difference in their lasting powers, but the most fragile ones may be kept in excellent condition for forty-eight hours, if gathered before the sun can stare them out of countenance, and placed at once in tepid water. Those which show any signs of drooping should be dipped head foremost in cold water and gently shaken. Flowers that have traveled a long distance are speedily revived by this treatment.

Nasturtiums, heliotrope, and above all, roses, should be gathered at night, if possible. Their stems, and those of all flowers kept in water, should be cut daily.

The wisteria is a beautiful but perishable blossom that seems to pine away in disgust when transferred to the house; but the Japanese have conquered this propensity by the most heroic treatment. They burn the cut stem of the graceful drooper, and then immerse it in spirits. Other woody plants, like hydrangea, branches of fruit blossoms, etc., can be treated in the same way.—Harper's Bazar.

Notes of the World's Progress

STRIKES IN DIFFERENT SECTIONS of the country prove the existence of a spirit of unrest in the ranks of organized labor, which is extremely unfortunate. In Chicago at present writing, upwards of 20,000 men are out, owing to differences which to the observer seem trivial. While in some instances labor has just cause for contention, in but too many cases disturbances arise, seemingly from a desire on the part of the walking delegate to earn the salary drawn from the Union which he represents. Last week in Chicago, three temporary injunctions were issued at the instance of employing corporations, restricting strikers from interference with the operation of plants, and as an important question is thus raised, it will likely be determined whether a striker is to be permitted to prevent a non-union laborer from earning his living, provided he wishes to. There can be no question of the right of workmen to quit if there be real or imaginary cause for dissatisfaction, but it is another matter when they attempt forcibly to prevent the operation of a plant.

IF IT BE TRUE, AS REPORTED FROM Stockholm, that Russia has notified the foreign minister of Norway and Sweden that those countries will be held responsible for any criticisms by Swedish or Norwegian officials, of Russian policy in Finland, subjects of these kingdoms may well wonder if they are shortly to be placed in a position similar to that of Finland. It is a strange condition when an autocratic government denies the right of free speech to subjects of another country, and hardly in line with the attitude assumed by Russia when that country invited other nations to a peace conference. It may be the report is incorrect if not, it is but a short step to interference with other functions of Norway and Sweden.

IT WAS AMONG THE POSSIBILITIES that when, in pursuit of business, men of this nation should cross the border into Mexico, trouble of some sort might arise. With the Mexican people themselves, we have had no serious disturbance for fifty years, but the development of mining interests on the border, and the consequent influx of Americans have brought about an outbreak of the Indians of the neighborhood, not against the Americans who have disturbed them, but against the Mexican government, with which they have held peaceful relations for many years. The Indians have gone on the war path, and much blood will probably be shed before the uprising is finally quelled.

GOVERNOR CHANDLER, OF GEORGIA, has made an appeal to the people of the State, irrespective of race or condition, to unite in putting an end to mob violence. In making the appeal, the governor expresses the belief that the only way to restore peace and tranquility, and bring to an end the lawlessness that has been manifested in different parts of the State, is for the people to uphold the courts, and aid them in bringing all criminals to speedy justice. In urging this course, it is argued that the ordinary process of law is sufficient to punish all crimes, that judges are pure and incorruptible, that juries are composed of upright and intelligent men, and that the interests of white men and negroes alike demand that mob violence be not tolerated. The attitude of Governor Chandler should be upheld by every upright and loyal citizen of the State. It is a blot on civilization that outrages in which the innocent frequently suffer with the guilty, should usurp legal process.

ON THE EVE OF HIS RETIREMENT from the cabinet, Secretary of War Alger issues a statement in defence of his official acts, the same being called out by an article in the London Times accusing him of making incompetent appointments and squandering large sums of public funds. The statement is very conservative, merely dealing with the charges of the Times, and not entering into questions which have been the basis of investigation. Inasmuch as the Secretary has resigned, and his connection with the department has been completely severed, the future, rather than the past, is a matter for public concern. Prompt and effective action by the department will remove all cause for criticism.

THE TRIPARTITE COMMISSION SENT to Samoa to investigate recent disturbances, and recommend a peaceful and practical solution of the difficulty, has returned to the United States, and a report of their investigations, embodying also a draft of a proposed new form of government, has been submitted to the three Powers involved, the United States, England, and Germany. The Commission reports that it has temporarily abolished the kingship, which for a time at least removes the cause of contention between the opposing factions. In place of the kingship, it is proposed to create a system of government analogous to that of the Fiji Islands, to erect administrative districts, for each of which a native chief will be responsible. It is also proposed to have an administrator appointed by a disinterested power, who, with representatives of the three interested Powers, will form a legislative council. Abolishment of consular jurisdiction is recommended, also more rigid enforcement of customs and regulations.

LAST YEAR'S EXPERIENCE IN THE art of drawing on imagination for facts appears to have still further demoralized the daily press of this country, or perhaps it might be better to say, its more yellow representatives. Last week we were treated to an elaborate account of an interview with Admiral Dewey, in which he was made to violate all his traditions as well as all the courtesies of his position. This "lie with circumstance," represented him as uttering the deliberate statement that our next great war would be with Germany. One can hardly imagine the possibility of a sane man making a statement of this sort, or any but an imbecile giving credit to it when made. But times are hard and news are scarce, and reporters' wages must be earned, and papers must be sold. There was no great danger of any serious damage being done by such a story, and the great admiral promptly contradicted it, and so war is not declared. One of the most serious problems for us to meet and solve is this irresponsible power and use of the public press.

ACCOUNTS CONTINUE TO ARRIVE (authenticity not guaranteed) of large returns from the Klondike. They may be true and they may not. It is possible that the modern Argonauts are faring better than their ancient brethren, and returning not merely with whole skins, but bringing a few clippings from the golden fleece. Granting this, it might be well, if it were possible, to have a balance sheet struck, and published, by which the truth might be comprehended that vastly more wealth has been spent in endeavoring to reach the gold fields of Alaska than has ever been dug from their soil. Even at the present claimed rate of output, it will be many years before the books can be balanced. With very few exceptions, the only ones who have been made wealthy by these discoveries are the outfitters and the transportation companies. And still the great army of the credulous takes up its line of march, and starts to seek the rainbow's foot, consoling itself for present hardship by dreams of wealth beyond human experience. There is as yet no law for the adequate punishment of those who entice fools to exercise wrong judgment.

VERY LITTLE THAT IS RELIABLE can be obtained concerning the Alaska-British Columbia disputed boundary. Some intemperate speech has been uttered by officials high in position in Canada, and some uneasiness has been manifested lest this might be the forerunner of unpleasantness between the mother country and the United States. It can probably, however, be assumed that this language, if authorized at all, is merely a move in the diplomatic game. Though not a vital necessity, it would doubtless be a great convenience could the treaty now existing be so interpreted by England and accepted by the United States as to give England control of a seaport on the Alaska coast. But it is hardly worth going to war for, and we may confidently expect that the good sense of both countries will intervene to settle the question fairly and equitably. It would be a curious comment on the late gush of friendship between these two cognate nations, should hostilities arise over so contemptible an issue.

Summer School for Clergymen

The summer school held in Trinity College school buildings, Port Hope, has been well attended by the clergy, many of whom have spent short vacations there. Much interest has centered in the addresses of the Rev. Dr. Peters, of St. Michael's church, New York city. Provost Welch, of Toronto, has given some very good lectures on the critical study of the pastoral epistles. The daily programme for the summer school is: Chapel 7:30 A. M. After breakfast, from 9:30 to 12:30, three lectures by specialists. The afternoon is given up to outdoor exercise, and evening chapel is at 8 o'clock. An informal lecture by one of the specialists is given afterwards.

The Bishop of Toronto sailed for England the second week in July. It is said that while there, he will endeavor to find a new principal for Trinity College school. Before his departure, the Bishop was presented with a check sufficient to cover all his traveling expenses. St. Peter's church, Toronto, sends nine members of its congregation to the diocesan synod. The Bishop of Moosonee is spending part of his furlough in Toronto. Much anxiety was felt about him some weeks ago, as his party was several days overdue on the way down from his far-away diocese. The delay was owing to the illness of the Indian pilot. The diocesan synod closed on Saturday morning, June 24th, after a four days' session. The Bishop's charge was very full, dealing with most matters of interest in the diocese. There are 189 clergy, of whom 155 are engaged in parochial work. In this connection, the Bishop said: "I have traveled through the length and breadth of this diocese, and never before have I seen more faithful, active, effective work being done by the clergy, nor have the parishes ever been so fully manned."

Diocese of Huron

The Bishop held a Confirmation at Trinity church, Watford, July 2d, and one at the Indian reservation on Walpole Island lately, on which occasion the largest class of candidates in the history of the mission was presented. Bishop Baldwin, in his charge to the Huron Synod, notices with thankfulness that the official returns for the year just ended show a solid and substantial increase in contributions all along the line. The diocesan Woman's Auxiliary's work was commended as expanding every year, also that of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew. The Bishop held 12 Quiet Days in the year, two in Toronto, and 10 in the diocese. Two ordinations have been held and two churches consecrated. The number of Confirmations held during the year was 81, and the number of persons confirmed, 1,817. The proposal now before the Huron Synod, having for its object the reduction of the superannuation allowance to aged and infirm clergymen, is much deplored.

Diocese of Ontario

The business session of the synod commenced June 27th, in St. George's Hall, Kingston, the Archbishop presiding. A proposition that in future the synod should only meet once in two years, was lost after a lively discussion. The voluntary contributions to the mission fund have decreased during the year more than $700. A hearty vote of thanks was tendered to the Bishop of Ottawa for his kindness in holding Confirmations during the Archbishop's absence in the winter.

A large number of clergy were present at the annual clerical picnic at Niagara Falls for the rural deanery of Lincoln and Welland. The tenth annual prize-giving for Ridley College school was held June 29th. A large addition is to be made to the school buildings during the holidays. The Bishop has been spending some of his vacation at Gloucester, Mass.

There was a large and representative gathering of clergy and laity at the dedication of the see house, Quebec, which has only lately become the property of the diocese by purchase. The service used was the one drawn up by Bishop Hall, of Vermont, for the dedication of his own see house at Burlington, Vt. The report of work done on the Labrador coast last winter in the missions there is very encouraging. At the service at the convocation of Bishop's College, Lennoxville, the sermon was preached by the Bishop of Niagara. The Bishop of Quebec sailed for England July 8th. Archdeacon Roe will act as commissary during the Bishop's absence.

The synod meeting on June 23d in Winnipeg declared against prohibition, only five delegates voting in favor of it. Total abstinence personally was approved of, but even this as an amendment, was deprecated by Archbishop Machray. He approved of it per se, but did not approve of it going on the records. The Archbishop presided at the synod missionary meeting, and spoke of the steady progress made in the diocese; 13 churches and two mission churches have been opened since his return from England, and all but two of them opened free from debt.

Three honorary canonries are to be created in the pro cathedral church of the Redeemer, Calgary. The Bishop's object in calling them into existence is to mark his sense of the extension of Church work in the diocese during the 12 years of his episcopate. The sum of £2,700 is still needed to complete the bishopric endowment fund.

Diocese of Fredericton

The synod of the diocese was opened at Chatham, July 4th. The annual convention of the Canadian Brotherhood of St. Andrew will be held this year in St. John, Aug. 24th-27th. Bishop Kingdon will deliver the charge to the convention. Bishop Hall, of Vermont, will address the meeting on the evening of the 25th, and Bishop Courtney will deliver the final sermon. Among those expected to be present are Dr. Ker, of Grace church, Montreal, and Mr. John Wood, general secretary of the Brotherhood in the United States. The Rev. R. P. McKim, of St. Luke's church, St. John, intends having a large wagon fitted up, and will hold meetings in the open air in different parts of the city. A quartette will lead the singing, and a small organ supply the music. Bishop Kingdon consecrated Trinity church, Mace's Bay, in June.

Many of the city clergy are away on their vacations. The Bishop is conducting his annual visitation tour in the eastern townships. Canon Norton, of Christ church cathedral, was presented with a purse on his departure for England, by members of his congregation. The cathedral branch of the Woman's Auxiliary have erected at the grave of their late president, Mrs. Norton, a beautiful white marble memorial cross, upon which is carved a small "Auxiliary" cross with inscription. A memorial tablet has also been erected in the chapel of the church at Laprairie, in memory of the late Ven. Archdeacon Lonsdale, the second clergyman who served at Laprairie. The church of St. James the Apostle, Montreal, is closed for some weeks, while the chancel is being rebuilt and enlarged. Services are held in the adjoining schoolroom for the present.

Chicago

Wm. Edward McLaren, D.D., D.C.L., Bishop

The Bishop of Chicago will be chief consecrator in the consecration of the Rev. Joseph M. Francis as Bishop of Indiana, which is appointed for St. Matthew's Day, Sept. 21st, in St. Paul's church, Evansville. This, with the consecration at Omaha on Oct. 18th, will make 16 such holy functions participated in by the Bishop of Chicago, who has already officiated in more consecrations to the episcopate than any other living member of the House of Bishops in America.

The Rev. Leonard B. Richards, of Jacksonville, Ills., was a visitor on Sunday at Christ church, Woodlawn, the duty in which he takes during the next few weeks, in the absence of the rector.

Vacations of the Bishop and Clergy

The Bishop and Mrs. McLaren expect to leave about Aug. 10th, for a trip down the St. Lawrence as far as Quebec, thence to New York, to meet their son from Mexico. The Rev. T. A. Snively is on vacation; the Rev. T. D. Phillips and C. Scadding left on Monday for three and four weeks' holiday, respectively, in Canada, with their wives, going first to Toronto, and then the latter to the Muskoka lakes; the former to visit friends and relatives in Kingston, Ottawa, Montreal, Three Rivers, and Quebec. The Revs. W. C. DeWitt, Pardee, Wolcott, and Williams left by boat on the 2d for Mackinac, where Mr. and Mrs. Williams will remain for a week, and then the Bishop elect, with the Rev. C. H. Bixby, will join the rest of the party in the camp on Rowe Island, in the Lizards group, close to the north shore of the great "Unsalted Sea," Lake Superior. The Rev. F. M. Gregg is in the South.

Dr. Locke's Seventieth Birthday

On Monday, July 24th, the Rev. Dr. Clinton Locke celebrated his 70th birthday at his summer home, Lockehaven, in We-que-ton-sing, on Little Traverse Bay. This anniversary was quite an event in the little hamlet. From three until six in the afternoon, Dr. and Mrs. Locke received the congratulations of their friends. The broad porch and the lovely lawn of their cottage were crowded with people. Many letters and telegrams were received from Chicago and elsewhere. The doctor was the recipient of many valuable gifts, and of quantities of beautiful flowers.

New York

Henry Codman Potter, D.D., LL.D., Bishop

At St. Bartholomew's church, the cadets under command of Maj. George McVicar have gone by the steamer "Idlewild" to Sands Point, on Long Island Sound, for a week's encampment.

Death of Judge O. T. Coffin

The senior warden of St. Peter's church, Peekskill, Judge Owen Tristram Coffin, died July 21st. He was for 24 years Surrogate of Westchester Co. In 1837 he graduated from Union College, and his alma mater conferred on him the honorary degree of Doctor of Laws later. The burial service was held at St. Peter's church, July 24th.

Services for Actors

At St. Chrysostom's chapel, of Trinity parish, the Rev. Thomas H. Sill, D.D., vicar, arrangements have been made in connection with the Actors' Church Alliance, by which services will be held at days and hours convenient for the attendance of actors. The chapel is conveniently located to the principal theatre centre of the city.

The Squirrel Inn

The deadlock between the Church Temperance Society and the city authorities over the opening of the proposed Squirrel Inn still continues, the issue being whether this is a hotel or a lodging house. The society has $12,000 on hand with which to begin the work as soon as the city government permits a mere technicality to be adjusted.

New Rector for St. Mark's

The vestry of St. Mark's church, has chosen to the rectorship, vacant by the resignation of the Rev. Dr. Rylance, the Rev. Loring W. Batten, Ph. D., and he has accepted. Dr. Batten is at present professor of Old Testament literature in the Philadelphia Divinity School, having held that chair for 10 years, in succession to the Rev. Dr. John P. Peters. Dr. Batten has been instrumental in building up several churches in and near Philadelphia. He was born in New Jersey in 1854, graduated from Harvard University in the class of '85, and from the Philadelphia Divinity School in 1887.

Consecration of St. Paul's, Chester

On the Feast of St. James, as noted last week, the Bishop consecrated this handsome new church. Four years ago, the Rev. Wm. E. Maison, now of Ogden, Utah, but then of Goshen, N. Y., began services in Chester. His successor in Goshen, the Rev. Geo. C. Betts, continued the work until, in October, 1897, the Rev. J. Helmes McGuinness, rector of St. John's, Arden, took charge. Under his administration the church was built and the parish organized, and finally the entire property, which is valued at $5,000, cleared of debt. The clergy of this parish conduct two parishes and two mission stations.

New Edifice for Church du Saint Esprit

This parish, the Rev. Alfred V. Wittmeyer, rector, which, as recorded in THE LIVING CHURCH some time ago, sold its former edifice and site for $200,000, has been completing plans from designs by Messrs. Brun & Hauser, for a new church building in French Gothic style. Land has been purchased for $55,000 on E. 27th st., near Madison ave., which is an improvement on the old site, but it is possible that this purchase may be treated as an investment, and land secured in a vicinity likely to be more permanent in its availability as a site for a church primarily intended for the French-speaking population of the city. An objection also, is the nearness of this site to the Madison Square Garden, a great place of public amusement. One object of leaving the old church building, was to procure a sinking fund of about $65,000, the interest of which is to be used in maintaining a home for French girls recently arrived in this country, and to carry on missionary work.

Pennsylvania

Ozi William Whitaker, D.D., LL.D., Bishop

Bishop Whitaker made an address at the funeral service of the late Arthur M. Burton, for 18 years the first and only president of the "Law and Order Society," whose remains were laid to rest on Tuesday, 25th ult.

Bishop Whitaker who had been passing a few days with personal friends at Elberon, N. J., returned to Philadelphia during the last week in July, and sailed from New York on the 29th ult., by the steamer "Statendam," for Rotterdam. Thence he will proceed to Switzerland and spend three weeks among the mountains, and, before his return in October, will pass a week or two in Paris.

Mission of St. John the Divine

As was stated in THE LIVING CHURCH of July 1st, a lot has been purchased for this mission, upon which it is proposed to erect a fine group of buildings for Church purposes. The first portion, to be built at once, will be a commodious parish house, plans for which have been prepared by George Natress & Son, architects. These show a well-arranged group of class rooms for the Sunday school, library, and infant class room on the first floor, with a large, well-lighted hall in the second story, which will be for the present utilized as a chapel, and capable of seating 300 persons. The present front on 25th st. is simply a plain looking brick, set back 16 ft. from the street line, and will ultimately give place to a handsome exterior of ecclesiastical design, in harmony with the church, and extending to the "building line" of the street.

Proposed Union of Parishes

On account of the finances of St. John's church, Northern Liberties, the vestry has appointed a committee of conference, at the suggestion of the wardens of the church of the Advent, with a view to a union with that parish, and possibly providing for a service in the German language. St. John's dates from 1816, and the Advent was admitted into union with the convention in 1842. Both are situated in the old district of the Northern Liberties, and are about a half mile apart. The character of the neighborhood where St. John's is located has undergone many changes, business houses having supplanted old-time residences, while the Advent's surroundings are quite the contrary. Each church has a seating capacity of 600; but the younger church has 346 communicants enrolled, while St. John's has no more than 143. The Advent reported, May 1st an endowment fund of $2,339.87, and St. John's has recently received $1,075 for the same purpose, and in about a year will increase this sum (from a residuary legacy) $5,000 to $10,000. As was stated in our last issue, the Rev. R. Heber Barnes has resigned the rectorship of St. John's.

Tennessee

Thomas Frank Gallor, D.D., Bishop

The Rev. George S. Robinson, of Chattanooga, recently made a visit to "Harriman Missions." On Monday, July 17th, in St. Andrew's church, Harriman, he celebrated the Holy Communion in the morning, and at night said Evensong and preached. Wednesday, in Christ church, Rugby, he solemnized a "double wedding," which was quite an event in the beautiful rural church. Wednesday night, in Quintard memorial church, at Glen Mary, he said Evensong and preached to a large congregation of coal-miners and their families. Thursday morning, he celebrated the Holy Eucharist and baptized four children. Friday, in Christ church, Rugby, at 7:30 A. M., he celebrated the Holy Eucharist, and also later at 11 A. M. The congregations were good, and showed much interest, and are looking forward to an early visit from the Bishop. There is evidence of revived activity in the mountains of East Tennessee.

Southern Virginia

Alfred M. Randolph, D.D., LL.D., Bishop

Fifteen Years' Rectorship—Rev. C. O. Pruden

On Sunday morning, July 16th, the Rev. C. O. Pruden, rector of Banister parish, Pittsylvania Co., which includes Emmanuel church, Chat-ham, St. John's, Mt. Airy, and Christ church, Piggs, gave a synopsis of his work in the parish since he became rector 15 years ago. His report was highly gratifying to his congregations. The present number of communicants in the three churches is about 300, an increase of nearly 40 percent. since he first took charge.

St. Thomas' church, Clarkton, has been rebuilt, and is now a pretty, comfortable, and substantial building, a testimony to the zeal and energy of Mrs. T. B. Clark. St. Luke's church, Clover, is about to undergo repairs, which have become a matter of necessity if the building is still to be used. These two churches, together with Christ church, Mt. Laurel, are in charge of the Rev. G. O. Mead who has a good rectory opposite the church at Clover, with two acres of land attached. The distance across the parish is 35 miles.

Farewell Service for Missionaries

On Sunday, July 16th, a large congregation gathered at Christ church, Norfolk, at 6 P. M., the object being a farewell service for those about to go forth as missionaries—the recently consecrated Bishop Funsten who goes to Idaho; the Rev. B. L. Ancell, to China; Dr. Edmund L. Woodward, to China, as a medical missionary, and Miss Neely, who also goes to a foreign mission. After Evening Prayer, Mr. Ancell spoke on "The righteousness of Christ and His religion." He was followed by Dr. Woodward who said that he would carry with him the Gospel as well as medicine to the Chinese mission. The closing address was made by Bishop Funsten who spoke of the joy it gave him to go to his new field.

Mission Services

Mr. J. R. Matthews who is pursuing his studies at Oxford University, England, preparatory to taking Holy Orders, and is well known in Virginia for the very successful Missions he has conducted in various churches in the two dioceses, began a Mission at Mt. Laurel and Clover, during the week ending July 16th, and at Clark-ton during the following week; he began a Mission also on Friday, the 21st, at Museville, concluding it on the 28th.

Bishop Funsten and family left Portsmouth Friday, July 21st, for Caroline Co., where they will spend the next 10 days, after which the Bishop will leave for his new field of labor in Idaho.

Lexington

Lewis W. Burton, D.D., Bishop

With reference to the ordination of the Rev. John A. Chapin, recorded in our issue of July 8th, the Bishop writes: "It was a peculiarly touching feature of the service, that the father and the son communicated the people, among whom the latter had grown up, with a record for uprightness all through his life. It added a pleasing zest to the occasion that nearly all the ministers of the city occupied special pews in the congregation, evidently delighting to do honor to the learned rector of the Nativity who dwells with them as a brother in unity of spirit. Altogether the day was an ideal one, full of the sweetest sentiment, and with nothing to mar the practical order of the services. It will be long fondly remembered in the parish as one of the bright associations of the beautiful church, and will reinforce the rector in his earnest efforts to advance the spiritual interests of the kingdom in his community."

Laying of Corner-Stone at Ashland

A year ago, July 18th, Calvary church, Ashland, Ky., was destroyed by fire. On the 21st of this July, the corner-stone of the new edifice was laid by Bishop Burton, assisted by the Rev. W. M. Washington, Ph. D., minister-in-charge, and by the Rev. Messrs. Hampton, of Iron-ton, Ohio, and Gibson, of Huntington, W. Va. The Rev. Mr. Hampton was the beloved rector when the former church building was erected, 11 years ago, and appropriately made the address on this occasion, being introduced by the Bishop. Dr. Washington announced that the contents of the present corner-stone are practically the same as those of the former. Indeed, the old corner-stone has been used as a base for the new. The architect, Mr. Geiske, of Ceredo, W. Va., has made a beautiful design, Churchly in every respect, yet comparatively inexpensive, so that it is likely that the generous wish of the former pastor, the Rev. Mr. Hampton, will be realized, and "the glory of this latter house shall be greater than of the former."

New Site for the Ashland School

As far back as the council of 1898, Bishop Burton foretold the probable necessity of the removal of the Ashland School for Girls to some more central and typical point in the diocese. This has been made possible by the transfer to the diocese of Lexington, by an aged citizen of the rich and beautiful county of Woodford, of his property in Versailles, in exchange for an annuity equal in amount to a fair rental, and necessarily limited in the term of years through which it must run. The property consists of six acres, eligibly situated, with two commodious houses upon it. The last council of the diocese received the property upon the terms mentioned, and committed it for school purposes to a board of trustees, consisting ex officio of the Bishop of the diocese; its chancellor, Mr. John F. Shelby, of Lexington; the president of the Woman's Auxiliary, Miss Mary E. Harrison, of Frankfort, and the rector of St. John's, Versailles, the Rev. A. C. Hensley. These four exercised the power given them by the council, and added to their number, Mrs. Johnson N. Camden, of Woodford Co.; Mr. H. N. Hills, of Gambier, Ohio, and General Fayette Hewitt, of Frankfort. At their last meeting at Versailles, July 5th, the board arranged for a contract with Mr. H. N. Hills, by which the latter undertook to conduct a diocesan school for girls upon the property in Versailles, without financial burden upon the diocese. The well-known ability of Mr. Hills as a school organizer, his great success in administering Kenyon Military Academy and Harcourt School for Girls, at Gambier, guarantee to the many probable patrons of a high-class institution in the Blue Grass region, that the school at Versailles, when it opens Sept. 13th, will meet all their reasonable expectations.

Minnesota

Henry B. Whipple, D.D., LL.D., Bishop
ML N. Gilbert, D.D., LL.D., Bishop-coadjutor

Bishop Gilbert officiated at the opening of the sixth triennial convention of the National Association of the Deaf, on the morning of July 11th, with the Rev. A. W. Mann as interpreter. The Rev. Mr. Koebler, pastor of All Souls' church for the deaf, Philadelphia, presided until his successor was chosen.

The Rev. H. P. Nichols, for seven years rector of St. Mark's church, Minneapolis, preached his farewell sermon, after which the congregation received the Eucharist, and all those who were confirmed during the time Mr. Nichols was rector, went forward in a body to bid their friend and pastor farewell.

The rector of Holy Trinity, Minneapolis, the Rev. Stuart Purves, with his choir boys, camped out at Bald Eagle Lake for ten days, and spent a very enjoyable outing.

Dr. Wright's Work in St. Paul

On the 8th Sunday after Trinity, Bishop Gilbert confirmed a supplementary class of 10 adults at St. Paul's church, St. Paul, presented by the rector, the Rev. John Wright, D.D. This makes 66 confirmed within two months. On the 9th Sunday after Trinity, the Rev. John Wright, D.D., completed his 12th year as rector. As the vestry has granted him a year's leave of absence, he delivered his farewell sermon, before a crowded congregation. In the evening, the choir was composed largely of past and present members. A festal Evensong was creditably rendered. The doctor, in a few touching words, addressed the choir and congregation, in place of a sermon. The Sunday school children presented the rector with a handsome leather case for his vestments, with his name engraved in letters of gold. Dr. and Mrs. Wright expect to put in a year's travel abroad, principally on account of Mrs. Wright's poor health. He leaves his church in splendid condition, the appointments are perfect, and a good substantial endowment behind it—the fruits of 12 years' faithful service and great personal sacrifice. His absence from the city will be greatly felt by all classes, especially the poor, amongst whom he has so faithfully labored. The Rev. Harvey Officer will look after the spiritualities during the rector's absence.

Milwaukee

Isaac Lea Nicholson, D.D., Bishop

On his way to the St. Paul convention, the Rev. A. W. Mann interpreted for the Rev. E. G. Richardson, at St. James' church, on Sunday evening, July 9th. Over 30 deaf-mutes were present in the congregation. The text of the sermon was, "In that day shall the deaf hear the words of the Book." On the return journey, a similar service was held at Christ church, La Crosse.

Washington

Henry Yates Satterlee, D.D., LL.D., Bishop
Festival of St. James' Church

The parish of St. James, the Rev. James W. Clark, rector, observed the Feast of St. James by a series of services, beginning with choral Evensong on the eve. At the early Celebration on the festival day, a goodly number of parishioners were present. A pleasant social gathering in the parish house followed the services. The choir boys of the church of St. Michael and All Angels have just returned from a two weeks' outing in the Alleghenies. They took part in the Church services of the neighborhood, and left an excellent impression among the people with whom they sojourned.

West Virginia

George W. Peterkin, D.D., LL.D., Bishop
Election of a Bishop-Coadjutor

On Monday, June 19th, Bishop Peterkin issued a call for a special council, "for the purpose of electing a Bishop Coadjutor, and to transact such other business as may be brought before them." The council accordingly assembled in Christ church, Clarksbury, on Thursday, July 26th. Divine service was held, the Rev. J. A. Ingle, missionary to China, preaching the sermon. Immediately after service, the council was called to order, Bishop Peterkin presiding. A quorum being present, the council was declared ready to proceed to business. Sixteen ballots were cast before the Rev. W. L. Gravatt, rector of Zion church, Charles Town, was declared duly elected Bishop-Coadjutor of the diocese, and the election made unanimous. It has not yet been decided where the Coadjutor will make his home. Huntington has made an offer, which it is reported will be accepted. For several years it has been apparent that the work in West Virginia has been too arduous for Bishop Peterkin. He has done it all, never neglecting a duty, but the work has been too hard to be kept up. He needs rest, and the election of a Bishop-Coadjutor will secure it for him. For a time it was proposed to lighten his labors by a division of the diocese, the Little Kanawha river to be the dividing line, but after consideration at one or two meetings of the council, that plan was abandoned.

Arkansas

Henry Niles Pierce, D.D., LL.D., Bishop
Wm. M. Brown, D.D., Bishop-Coadjutor

St. Paul's, Batesville

On St. John's Day, the anniversary of his consecration to the episcopate, Bishop Brown visited Batesville, the Rev. Caleb B. K. Weed, rector, and celebrated Holy Communion, the Rev. R. W. Rhames preaching. On Sunday the Bishop preached both morning and evening to large congregations, and at the evening service confirmed a class of nine persons, this being the second class presented from this parish during the Bishop's first year in the diocese. At the morning service the Bishop blessed three memorials placed in the church since Easter—a solid silver and jeweled chalice and paten, memorial of the late Rev. Caleb Alexander Bruce, by whom the present church edifice was built; the service is very handsome, and was made from silver, gold and jewels, given by the parishioners in the churches at Helena, Marianna, Forest City, Newport, and Batesville, of which the late Mr. Bruce was rector; a black walnut hymn tablet memorial of Mrs. Elvira Fowler Boyd, a teacher, who entered Paradise in February last; an altar service book, in remembrance of the ordination to the priesthood of the Rev. Caleb B. K. Weed. A branch of the Woman's Auxiliary to the Board of Missions has been formed, and the work in the parish is in a prosperous condition, the outlook generally being very encouraging.

Western New York

Wm. D. Walker, D.D., LL.D., Bishop
Institution of Rev. L. G. Morris

On Sunday, July 9th, the Rev. Lewis G. Morris was instituted rector of Christ church, Pittsford, by Bishop Walker. The Ven. Archdeacon Washburn was the preacher. The work in the parish has, under God's blessing, prospered in the last few months. The Rev. Mr. Morris accepted a unanimous call, and began his work with the Lenten season. He found the parish in a crippled condition financially, with a debt of over $800; there was considerable division of feeling and a good deal of indifference to be encountered. Immediately upon taking up his work, Mr. Morris set about reorganizing the various parochial societies and establishing new ones, all of which have since done good and faithful work. An early celebration of the Holy Communion on Sundays was instituted, and is unusually well attended. Since Easter, nearly $500 of the debt has been paid. Mr. and Mrs. Tracy Nelson have presented a re-table and a credence in memory of their daughter. The various colored hangings have been given by the Parish Aid Society. St. Cecilia's Guild, composed of little girls, presented a beautiful altar-desk. On June 4th, the Bishop visited the parish and confirmed 12 persons. This parish, which has had so many troubles and disasters in the past, seems now to have entered upon a new era of existence.

Pittsburgh

Cortlandt Whitehead, D.D., Bishop

A delightful reception was given in the parish house of St. Luke's church, on Wednesday evening, July 5th, in commemoration of the 10th anniversary of the rectorship of the Rev. Daniel Duroe. The parish has prospered very greatly, and the last year has witnessed the enlargement of the church, the payment of all indebtedness upon it, followed by its consecration, and the erection of a well-equipped and commodious parish house.

North Dakota

Samuel C. Edsall, D.D., Bishop

The choir boys of St. Paul's church, Grand Forks, were given a four days' outing in camp at Detroit Lake, Minn. On Sunday the choir sang in the pretty St. Luke's church in the village. Bishop Edsall, who was at the lake with his family, preached in the morning, and the Rev. A. T. Gesner, of Grand Forks, in the evening. The church was insufficient to hold the congregation which attended these services, and a number listened at the windows outside. During the outing the Church people of Detroit furnished an abundance of provisions every day. The party took with it a professional cook, who volunteered his services free during the expedition, so the boys enjoyed an excellent table. It is hoped that the choir outing may hereafter be an annual occurrence, granted as a reward of merit.

Ohio

Wm. Andrew Leonard, D.D., Bishop

Mr. John D. Lloyd, organist and choirmaster of St. Paul's pro-cathedral, Springfield, Ill., for the past nine years, has resigned his position, and accepted that of organist and choirmaster of Emmanuel church, Cleveland, Ohio, in succession to Dr. Frederick Rogers. Mr. Lloyd enters upon his new work early in September.

Georgia

Cleland Kinlock Nelson, D.D., Bishop

The Rev. Wylls Rede, D.D., has resigned the rectorship of the church of the Incarnation, Atlanta, having been appointed by the Bishop general missionary of the diocese. The Rev. H. B. Dean, late a resident of Albany, Ga., was called to succeed Dr. Rede, and took charge immediately upon Dr. Rede's resignation. Mr. Dean will also become a prebendary of the cathedral.

Parish House of St. Thomas', Thomasville

The new building described in our issue of May 13th having been completed, the formal opening was made the occasion of a special service. The Sunday school, choir, and congregation having gathered in the church, passed in procession into the large hall of the parish house, singing "Onward, Christian Soldiers." A shortened form of Morning Prayer was said, with an address by the rector, the Rev. G. S. Whitney, who gave a review of the history of the parish from its foundation in 1867. The congregation then returned to the church, and Holy Communion was celebrated. The parish has also acquired the large corner lot adjoining the church for the future building of a new rectory. It was the gift of a few generous friends.

Progress in the Diocese

From the Bishop's address delivered recently in the cathedral, Atlanta, we take the following: Since March, 1892, 4 parish churches and 3 chapels have been erected, as well as 36 mission churches; 6 churches have been restored; 3 buildings have been acquired as gifts, making a total of 52 buildings in the past seven years; 5 of these buildings replace others destroyed by tornadoes, and two by fire. The value of property acquired in the missions alone will probably equal $65,000; within this period 1,100 persons have been confirmed.

With the Ojibways

A LETTER FROM MRS. MORRISON, WIFE OF THE BISHOP OF DULUTH

You will see by the Bishop's report that we have ten mission stations among these Chippewas or Ojibways, as they are sometimes called. Most of these missions are ministered to by native deacons who hold service and preach in their own tongue. Two white priests are among them also. All this Indian work is under the charge of an archdeacon, subject, of course, to the Bishop. Next summer, God willing, another Indian will leave Seabury Divinity School, prepared to go to his red brothers with the Gospel. He will be sent to the 4,000 who as yet have not had any teaching or preaching, heathen, savages almost, but peaceable and ready to be taught, only so ignorant, so dirty, so filled with superstition, and so tied to their low pleasures, that patience untold is needed to conquer them. That they can be conquered I can testify, for I visited the most isolated and very poorest of the missions, and there found a people kindly disposed, hospitable, comparatively clean, reverent in church, and devout in receiving the Sacrament. In fact, the Bishop says he never visits an Indian station without finding a class prepared for Confirmation, which is more than can be said for the white missions.

Here, at Cass Lake, where in 1853 the tribe, under pressure of hunger, proved cannibals—we were entertained in the little parsonage, stayed over night, and held council with a chief and other Indians, and were as safe as at home. I shall never forget the drive to Cass Lake from Leech Lake, 15 miles right through the woods, pines, pines—Jack pines and Norway pines! How lovely they were, with their tall boles rising up in straight grey masses, clustering often like granite pillars, giving a grand cathedral effect, while the boughs, arching high overhead, made the true Gothic aisle, as we drove through. Underneath, it was pretty rough, the only road being one made by a lumber box-wagon driven over the pine tree roots, and the wagon we were in was the only one in the reservation. Coming out upon the bank of the Mississippi (it rises near there in Lake Itasca) just at sunset, we found the Rev. George Morgan, our Indian deacon, waiting for us with his mission canoes of birch bark. It was such a lovely scene! The red rays of the sinking sun shining across the still water, and through the tall wild rice growing in the water there, the trees overhanging the low banks of the river, and casting purple shadows beneath their masses, and the picturesque birchen canoes gliding noiselessly, as the Indians knelt and silently paddled us over the river.

Landed on the other shore, Mr. Morgan sent one of his little boys to ring the church bell to tell the people "the Bishop had come," and on we walked to the parsonage. This is a log house, containing one room only. It possessed for furniture two double beds, one cushioned Boston rocker, a few wooden chairs, two tables, a cupboard, a cooking-stove, a trunk, and a wash-tub, which latter did duty also as a cellar. Right side up, it was a wash-tub; inverted, it became a cellar, and at least hid from view the left over food from the table, and the uncooked food for the next day or meal.

Mrs. Morgan, a young Dakota Indian, gave us a warm welcome with hand and face, though she does not speak English; our archdeacon, however, interpreted, and told us of her affectionate greeting. She Makous was neatly dressed in turkey red, with braided hair tied with black ribbon. Two other women were there helping her, both of whom were confirmed that evening. When we had been there but a few moments, an Indian, Nitta-we-jah-bo, came to the door with three wild ducks in his hand, an offering for the Great Black Robe, as they call the Bishop. Then two dear little girls came in from a tent near by; they were bare-footed, bare-legged, and brown-skinned, but their dark blue dresses were clean, and I found they liked stick candy as much as white children do. One little brownie has a name which, when translated, means "Little White Bird." One of the girls who was confirmed has a name meaning "Sky goes sailing all round."

The supper which was served us was very good, Mrs. Morgan having been taught in one of the schools under government supervision. It consisted of fried white fish, warmed potato, poached eggs, bread and butter, blueberry pie, and canned blue berries. A nice white cloth was on the table; and although there was no cream for the coffee, there being no cow on the reservation, we enjoyed our meal, all the more that it was a Christian meal, for when the Bishop asked the blessing, every one in the room stood and responded a clear "Amen!"

The little church is of logs, and was out of repair, but has since been put in order by a lady in New York. Four were confirmed that night. Mr. Morgan read the service in the Chippewa tongue, and the hymns were sung in Chippewa. The Prayer Book and some hymns have been translated for them by our faithful archdeacon, Mr. Giffilan. Most of the Indians there still wear their blankets, and it was a strange sight to see the long, backless benches peopled with these odd, half-crouching figures, with unkempt hair, and blankets drawn up over their ears. But they were all reverent, and many responded; some sang. They think a great deal of their church, and even some of the heathen come there to sit on the back seat, and listen, and keep warm. Who can tell how much of the truth may glimmer in upon their darkened hearts?

The Bishop preached by an interpreter, and after service we all went over to the parsonage, when the old chief and other Indians gathered round, smoked with glee the cigars the Bishop gave them, and then solemnly one of them made a formal address to the Bishop, after shaking hands very formally with us all. He was very picturesque as he stood there, a typical Red man, fine featured, erect, brown-skinned, and dignified; hair braided still in the scalp lock, and blanket over his shoulders, his hands lightly clasped before him, head well up, and body slightly swaying as he spoke; and he spoke well, too, telling of the history of the mission and its present needs, and bidding the Bishop welcome on his first visit there.

Meantime, Mrs. Morgan and her two assistants were attending to the wants of the household. They sat upon the floor with a big dishpan between them, and, by the light of a lantern swung from a beam overhead, picked and cleaned the ducks, while to add zest to the scene, a lively little kitten sported about them, grabbing at a leg or a wing that might happen to project over the edge of the pan. Well, when speeches were made, pipes smoked, and ducks picked and in the pot, the conclave dispersed.

A sheet partition divided the room in two, and we were very comfortable for the night. The rain outside pelted against the window panes, making us glad that we were well housed.—Spirit of Missions.

LUXURY AND EDUCATION.—Many of the costliest edifices in the land belong to colleges and universities. Millions of dollars are asked for buildings and equipments, where only thousands used to be expected. A large proportion of those who go out from these institutions probably never afterwards will occupy so expensive houses as are provided for them by private or public benevolence during their student days. Relatively, also, the cost to the students themselves of supplementing what is thus furnished to them is much increased. Yet where all are beneficiaries, distinctions between rich and poor have grown to be as marked in some universities as in the outer world. Young men and women are there estimated much less than formerly according to their intellectual attainments and moral character, much more according to the money they spend. It is a question worthy of the gravest consideration, whether lavish gifts to higher institutions of learning tend to accomplish the ends for which those gifts are presumably made—the cultivation of high types of Christian character.

The Church Times

ROMANISM IN ENGLAND.—In our leading columns the question is discussed whether the Roman mission is making progress in England. The conclusion that such is not the case is based on an article in the Nuova Antologia, from the pen of Mr. Richard Bagot, an English Romanist, long resident in Rome. In his opinion, the Vatican is nursing a strange illusion if it supposes that England is moving along the path that ends in reconciliation with, or submission to, Rome. It is interesting to find that Mr. Bagot's conclusions are borne out by the Registrar-General's marriage returns, in regard to which it should be remembered that the strong discipline of the Roman Church secures that the vast majority of the marriages of Romanists are solemnized according to the Roman rite. To come to figures: in 1853, Romanist marriages were 51 in the thousand; in 1857, they were 46; in 1867, they dropped to 44; and in 1897, to 41. Thus, in a period of 44 years, during the latter part of which the number of converts to Romanism has been rated as high as 600 a month, there has been a fall from 51 to 41 in every thousand marriages, and this in spite of the enormous growth of population.

The Outlook

OUR DEPENDENT PEOPLES.—We assumed that the Indian had not the capacity for self government; but until very recently we have made no systematic attempts to endow him with that capacity. We have shut him up in reservations, have left him to himself, have excluded him from the forces which were operative in developing manhood in all free American communities, have left him to his own savage self-control, barely exercising enough government over him to prevent him from hurting others, and, except where Christian philanthropy has, at great disadvantage, done something to create in him that equanimity, and give to him that reason and prudence which would enable him to do as circumstances require, he is much the same savage to-day that he was when Columbus discovered America. In so far as he has been left free to exercise his inalienable right of self-government, he has remained a savage. In the case of the negro we went to the other extreme; we assumed that he possessed the equanimity which would enable him in any situation to be reasonable and prudent, and to do what the circumstances might require, and so we gave him what we called the right of self-government, without first making any effort to endow him with the capacity of self-government. The consequence was that he suffered at first under the self-inflicted evils of a carpet-bag rule, and is now suffering under the evils of a reaction, the issue of which no man can foresee. This much, however, is certain, that unless his white neighbors in the South see that the end of all good government is self-government, their community will fail in accomplishing its true ends, because those ends are not understood. In the Philippines we are in danger from a disregard of both principles. . . . What we have to do is to govern the Filipinos as to develop in them the capacity for self-government.

Editorials and Contributions

THE Epworth League is angry because the Attorney General of the U. S. whose decision was in favor of the army canteen as against the irresponsible saloon, is not dismissed from his portfolio. "The members of our committee are ready to a man to condemn Mr. Griggs, and if some of them have their way, which is not unlikely, this convention will unite in requesting a Methodist President to accede to the wishes of a great Methodist society." It is a matter of regret that a body of Christians which is popularly credited with a good deal of involvement in secular politics, should commit itself through its Epworth League to such an indefensible position. When did Mr. McKinley become a Methodist President? That he is a Methodist we do not doubt, but as President of the United States he is neither Methodist, Baptist, Roman Catholic, nor Dunker, and as President, he is oath-bound to administer law according to the terms of the Constitution, without any religious test whatsoever. What would our Methodist friends have said if the Roman Catholics had dictated to the late Chief Justice Taney as to his decisions in law, on the ground that a Catholic Chief Justice should accede to the wishes of the great Roman Church?

THE spread of the divorce curse is one of the signs of prevalent degeneration. There is great need of stringent legislation and its courageous application. The consecutive polygamists, when of the rich and fashionable class, do not hesitate to bribe their way into alleged matrimony, and there are other kinds of bribes than that of money. There are also men who will take the bribe. As the Church includes many of the rich class, rich only in this world's goods, it is particularly incumbent on our bishops and clergy to show forth a fearless devotion to the law of God, and to determine at any expense to make the law of the Church conform to the law of God. It is enough to make angels weep to see the standards lowered by concession to animal lust. The end of natural marriage is the death of religion. Religion, in upholding this sacrament, will save both marriage and religion. The faith of the Gospel is no more at stake than its ethics are.

BY the testimony of those who are in position to speak positively, there is an increase in the number of ministers seeking admission to the priesthood. There is also grave reason to fear that some of our bishops are very indifferent to the requirements of the Canons, and very eager to welcome men who had better stay in the nests where they were hatched, so far at least as our Catholic Orders are involved. It is a delicate question to touch, because so many of our clergy spent the earlier part of their lives in modern bodies not having Apostolic Orders. But we happen to know that many of them deplore, as deeply as any of us can, the easy pathways of transition which are now provided for men who ought, in all conscience, to know something of the customs and usages and nomenclature of the Church whose Orders they seek. Undoubtedly, if the facts were presented, they would equally deplore the lack of careful scrutiny of antecedents, especially with respect to moral character.

This Church may be very roomy, but it has doors and tylers, and is not big enough to take in cowans and eavesdroppers whence-soever they come. It would seem to be well, therefore, if the tylers should take up their staves and guard the entrance with fearless fidelity. They shall thus spare themselves the now frequent pain of having to depose so many misfits and goats from our Orders.

OUR readers will find in another column an extract from The Church Eclectic, on "Responsibility for Ordination." We commend it to the consideration of rectors or priests, upon whose judgment the Church has placed the first responsibility. Standing committees and bishops also would do well to consider how weighty a matter it is, and what serious consequences are sure to flow from unadvised action on their part. But we confess that editorial protests against prevailing laxity and disregard of law, at once in its letter and in its spirit, are not a promising method of dealing with this increasing evil which, unless arrested by some process more stern, threatens to deteriorate a large fraction of our clergy, until "the cloth," the good suffering with the bad, will fall into contempt. We believe that this subject ought to be treated by the venerable Order which has most to do with the matter, and for which the Church prays God to "so guide and govern the minds of Thy servants, the Bishops and Pastors of Thy flock, that they may lay hands suddenly on no man, but faithfully and wisely make choice of fit persons to serve in the sacred Ministry of Thy Church."

WE are glad to note in the Journal, that the House of Bishops has appointed the Bishops of Kentucky, New York, and Albany to prepare the Pastoral Letter of 1901. May we suggest to these respected fathers that they consider this question of responsibility for ordination, and that they hesitate not to utter solemn protest against those of their Order who are to a large extent responsible for the apparent inundation of unfit men. Perhaps also we may venture to suggest that while remonstrating with their brethren and with the standing committees, they might consider to what extent theological seminaries should show their disapproval and indignant protest. The evil is so glaringly on the increase that self-preservation comes to the front, and demands even more positive measures than the dignified but often too placid language of a Pastoral Letter.

Mission Schools In Japan

A JAPANESE newspaper, lately at hand, gives an account of the proceedings of the "Higher Educational Council" in April last. Some of the measures proposed in this council have a serious bearing on Christian missionary work in Japan. What is called a conservative reaction is at present going on. The striking peculiarity of this movement is that it is an attempt to fight against Western ideas through institutions borrowed from the West. There is a department of education apparently modeled upon the French system. The specific object of the council is to work this system in the interests of paganism, or at least in such a way as to obstruct the spread of Christian-ty as much as possible. This came to light most distinctly in a measure relating to private schools. Foreigners not conversant with the Japanese language are not to be allowed to become teachers of anything except foreign languages or special courses in special schools, and of schools intended exclusively for foreigners. Every founder of a school must have a teacher's license, and no foreigner is to be allowed to found a school except for foreigners. There is also a clause prohibiting religious education and ceremonies in private schools. The effect of all this upon Christian missionary work is clear. It amounts to the destruction of the mission schools, or at least to the loss of the religious character, without which there is no reason for their existence.

A N editorial, together with several letters from correspondents, in the Japan Times of April 28th, makes it evident that the significance of the proceedings of the Educational Council is well understood. The Times deplores the encouragement given to this policy by those high in authority. It does not believe, however, that the present ministers of State will accept this programme of exclusiveness. The Rev. Arthur Lloyd, of our own mission, writing to The Spirit of Missions, also thinks that the present ministry will not accept the recommendations of the council. But the council will have a longer lease of life than the ministry, and its policy may triumph in the end. Mr. Lloyd hopes the storm will blow over, but he adds to this his conviction that "the days when a foreigner can hope to control a Japanese school are numbered. Our Japanese brethren must more and more assume the burdens of school management." He further says: "If we have to stand by and see our schools go into the hands of our Japanese brethren, it will only be a sign that God has other work for us to do." This is to dismiss a rather serious matter much too lightly, for what is contemplated involves a revolution in educational affairs which is calculated to be a great embarrassment to missionary work.

IT is to be feared that the idea of dismissing religious instruction from the schools is likely to be only too congenial to some of the "Japanese brethren" referred to. But it must be remembered that the mission schools were founded by means of Christian gifts and for purposes of Christian education. It is quite certain that except so far as they may be endowed, the support of Churchmen could no longer be obtained if their character should be changed. That the danger is no visionary one is plain to those who know anything of the experience of those Christian bodies who have outstripped themselves in the prevailing craze to put everything into the hands of the Japanese converts. It is, we believe, well known that in certain cases, schools founded and endowed through missionary boards in this country, have become entirely secularized. We have in mind an instance of this kind, a college founded in the interests of Christianity, in which the Japanese element gradually becoming dominant, to the exclusion of foreigners, the Christian religion has ceased to count for anything. We fear it is only too true that, with some notable exceptions, the common run of Japanese converts, even such as have been appointed catechists and have been admitted to Holy Orders, are not yet so sound in the Catholic Faith or so habituated to the life of the Church that they can be trusted with the management of affairs. There is danger of the emergence of a mongrel phase of religion which, under the specious name of Japanese Christianity, may jeopardize the essentials of the Catholic Faith and Order. Several generations must elapse before a Christianity of a firm and settled character can be looked for among this restless and versatile race. We feel sure that the wise and thoughtful men whom the Church has placed in charge of this important work, will not allow themselves to be cowed by the present outcry against "foreigners." So far as religion and education are concerned, nothing can be clearer than that the so-called "conservative" movement has its source in the heathen cults which are endangered by the vigor and attractiveness of the Christian religion. It is suicidal to yield anything to such influences, even in the most indirect way. It is difficult to see how a community with any title to the name of Christian can be formed in such a country as Japan, without schools in which the converts may bring up their children in the faith necessary to salvation.

Forgotten Offices of the Prayer Book

BY EDW. WM. WORTHINGTON

IT is undoubtedly a fact that three offices of the Prayer Book have fallen into general disuse: The Visitation of the Sick, the Churching of Women, and the Institution of Ministers. A fourth might be added: The Visitation of Prisoners. But upon the three first named we may particularly dwell, for it seems not to be realized how seriously individuals, parishes, and communities are losers by the neglect of these gracious provisions of the Book of Common Prayer.

* * * *

The Office for the Visitation of the Sick is framed in recognition of the Church's duty to minister righteously to those "in the valley and shadow of death," who are either to return through providential recovery to a chastened and more serious discharge of the responsibilities of this earthly life, or else are to pass on to that abiding place where "there is an account to be given unto the Righteous Judge, by whom all must be judged, without respect of persons."

It is not an easy matter for the conscientious priest to perform what he knows to be his entire obligation toward those in sickness whom God from time to time entrusts to his spiritual care. He may sympathize, and plead earnestly for their recovery, if in accordance with God's will. This he must do, and will do tenderly. But how shall he help them to that repentance which befits even the holiest and best of men, and how shall he bring them to the putting of "their full trust only in God's mercy," with hope of salvation, not through human merit, but through the blood of Christ?

Unwisely, and too generally, it is felt that the mention of sin and of repentance must be excluded from the prayers of the sick room. I do not believe, however, that this is so much the desire of the sick themselves as of mistaken friends.

At least we may remind ourselves that we have to do with peculiar conditions at the present time. There is little realization of the nature of sin, and not much belief in the necessity of repentance, even among those who are professedly Christian people. No one defends this as in accord with what God has revealed; but it is general. It is a delusion which beguiles men through their years of prosperity and health, and follows them even to the sick-room, the antechamber of death.

But the Church must be true to such men; and how can this be done better, and more acceptably to the men themselves, than in the use, as occasion offers, of the Visitation Office, which puts the matter right and straight, helps to find help, and comforts with that consolation which is not foundationless?

The belief seems to prevail, to some extent among the clergy, that the Visitation Office is coldly formal, too wearisome as to length for even occasional use, and too insistent upon that which may be taken for granted. These impressions are not well grounded. And, if it be said that this office is designed for sinners, who that is a Christian will not reply: "God forbid that otherwise than as a sinner I shall be regarded, and dealt with, and ministered to, in my final sickness, and at the hour of death?"

In view of the issues that are involved, and the neglects that are possible, in view of the loose notions that prevail with regard to the nature of sin and the necessity of repentance, in view of the temptation which remains to bring men an easy consolation rather than the help most needed, may it not be more than probable that the Church and the Church's children have suffered a distinct loss in the almost universal disuse of the Prayer Book Office for the Visitation of the Sick?

Even more emphatically may it be said that the banishment of the Churching Office is a signal disaster.

In this beautiful provision of the Prayer Book, the Church and the Home clasp hands in holy union, and are united in the devout giving of thanks for a specific blessing, vouchsafed under the shadowing protection of God. The Churching Office witnesses to the honor and the dignity of Christian motherhood. In an age when society too generally commends marriage in proportion to the degree in which it is wholly or approximately childless, this office of the Prayer Book, in addition to the value of its chief purpose, should be esteemed as a plea for domestic righteousness and a much-needed reiteration of the Psalmist's declaration that "children are a gift and heritage that cometh of the Lord."

The reasons alleged for the banishment of the Churching Office do not remain, or are not found to be serious, within communities and parishes in which its restoration to use has been permanently accomplished. And, on the other hand, how great the blessing! Who can estimate the extent to which marriage is made sacred, Christian motherhood is exalted, and the highest interests of the home are safe-guarded, wherever this Prayer Book provision is valued and its use stands as an established custom?

The noble words of Bishop Coxé upon this subject deserve careful consideration:

The neglect of that beautiful provision for sanctifying and glorifying maternity, "the Churching of Women," is discredit to our civilization. It used to be observed most sacredly by virtuous women of all conditions in life, as a tribute to their own self-respect; by the lowly, as a token of their honorable marriage; by the affluent, as evidence of their refined and elevated views of the dignity of motherhood. To such motives a truly devout woman adds her sense of gratitude to God for the greatest of blessings, for the answer to her prayers, and for her high vocation to be the educator of an immortal soul. It seems incredible to me that any woman can attach degrading associations to such a solemnity. But, perhaps, this is one consequence of the neglect of a duty which, if observed conscientiously, would forever banish the false modesty and the gross ideas which are prevalent among too many. Until Christian women honor themselves and glorify their own condition in the use of this most becoming office, it cannot be expected that such vices will cease to prevail. The remedy is with yourselves. Let the Church's daughters do in all things as the Bride of Christ teaches them to do, and they will find a rich reward in the blessed effects that will follow in the household and in the community.

No observant moralist can close his eyes to the fact that our present-day civilization is threatened with dissolution through home demoralization, laid bare in the ominous records of the divorce court. There are communities in which it even seems as if the Church and the home are themselves divorced, one from the other. How shall they be brought again into such union that the Church may resume the exercise of its divinely appointed power to influence and to sanctify the home? A single and complete answer cannot be given to so great a question. But this, perhaps, is deserving of some serious consideration: That forgotten office of the Prayer Book, in which mothers rejoice to acknowledge their dependence upon God, let it be revived and restored to use everywhere, that the home and the Church may again clasp hands, in thankful recognition of Him "without whom nothing is strong, nothing is holy."

Like the other two, the third neglected office of the Prayer Book is designed to exercise helpful influence within an area of life in which there is "present distress."

Very earnest thought has been turned of late to the question: "Is there room in the ministry?" Few are found to deny the fact that within the Church the actual relationship of pastor to people, and of people to pastor, is far below what might be wished, and is widely divergent from what the Church's polity leads us to expect with some degree of confidence. There may have been a letting down in two directions,—of the clergy, perhaps, as to self-sacrifice, enterprise, and devotion; and of the laity, perhaps, as to considerate loyalty toward those who "watch for their souls, as they that must give account." It seems certain that the unhappy conditions which exist are not to pass away speedily. How shall they pass away at all, unless by general consent we resolve to accustom ourselves to the thought and the influence of a high ideal, ever before us, of what ought to be the mutual relationship between pastor and people?

We have that high ideal, embodied and excellently formulated for us, in the Prayer Book Office of Institution of Ministers into Parishes.

But why, in gatherings of Church people, clerical and lay, does the mention of the Institution Office, and the suggestion of its possible use, provoke a smile? Not because it is a childish or pedantic office, but rather because we have so far drifted away from all earnest and sustained devotion to its principles, that the use of this office in connection with the induction of a minister into his cure, seems to give promise of something entirely beyond that which even the most sanguine feel privileged to expect.

The Institution Office brings the Bishop into the transaction, and proceeds upon the principle that he is to his clergy the source of their jurisdiction within the diocese. This really does seem a little strange and somewhat startling to minds that have accustomed themselves to regard the parish, rather than the diocese, as the ecclesiastical unit.

The Institution Office seems to take it for granted that the man instituted intends (God willing) to remain awhile, and that the congregation also expects him to remain. The "good-day and good-bye" idea, and the experimental idea of awaiting only the as-yet-undetermined verdict of like or dislike, have no place in this portion of the Prayer Book. The Institution Office brings the priest into his newly appointed cure as one "not shorn of authority," and encourages him to make good this claim through the exercise of godliness, humility, and diligence.

Furthermore and especially, the Institution Office reminds both pastor and people that the mutual relationship into which they enter is a very sacred thing, requiring and deserving the prayers of all concerned.

Does it not seem a pity that so excellent an office, this provision of the Prayer Book, emphatically needed in "the present distress," should be unused, discarded, and practically forgotten?

* * * *

A considerable portion, then, of our Book of Common Prayer has suffered temporarily the fate which befell the Law anterior to the days of Josiah (II Kings xxli). Where in the Church are Hilkiah and Ahikam and Achbor and Shaphan and Huldah, who shall bring it out again and restore it to honorable use?

Responsibility for Ordination

FROM The Church Eclectic

THE increasing number of depositions from the ministry, the considerable number of the clergy who seem unadapted to the work of the ministry, the alarming number of those whose doctrinal position seems to vary from that of the Church's standards, the occasional instances of crime among the clergy, and the occasional cases of ordination of those who seem out of sympathy with the Church's life and the Church's doctrine, all these suggest a careful consideration of the safeguards which the Church has thrown around her ministry, with a further question as to their sufficiency, and an endeavor to place the responsibility for the manifold evils resulting from these causes.

It is clear that there has not always been that sense of responsibility attached to the actions of all those concerned with the ordination of candidates, or so many mistakes could not have been made. When there are clergymen blandly denying that they hold to the "tri-personality" of God, or ever did hold to it, or declaring that we really cannot tell where the Word of God is to be found, it seems incredible that vestry, rector, bishop, examining chaplains, and standing committee, can all have carefully weighed the matter as they are required to do by the canon, and have been so egregiously deceived. It is not sufficient to lay the blame on the man himself, on the ground that he signed the canonical declaration and took the ordination vows upon himself. The intellectual eccentricity which permits a man holding such views to take upon himself the canonical declarations and the ordination vows, and to use the Church's Prayer Book, and yet consider himself honest, is less to be wondered at than is the apparent lapse of sanity on the part of those appointed to guard the entrance to the ministry.

These various authorities are not to shift the responsibility upon the individual, but are to exercise their own discretion. To be willing to sign a declaration or to take a vow which one cannot ex animo accept or perform, constitutes a moral disability which it is the function alike of the bishop and the standing committee to discover; while it also constitutes a theological disability which bishop, standing committee, and examining chaplains ought to have been able to find.

The Church suffers, and will continue to suffer, from the strange lack of a sense of responsibility on the part of those who are so explicitly charged with responsibility by the canons. Parishes are wrecked by incompetents, and faith is wrecked by heretics, who would have found no place within the ministry of the Church if vestries, rectors, bishops, examining chaplains, and standing committees—and priests, as well, who present the candidates for ordination—had been mindful of their responsibilities.

Letters to the Editor

THE DECLARATION ON THE MARRIAGE LAW OF THE CHURCH

To the Editor of The Living Church:

In receiving and arranging the names of clergymen who signed the Declaration on the Marriage Law of the Church, which was recently sent to all the clergy, a few names were unfortunately omitted. More than fifteen hundred names came to the committee on postal cards, and then they all had to be alphabetically arranged and printed. The owners of some of the omitted names have written to the committee. Others who did not sign at first, have written since the publication of the list, wishing their names might appear as signers. The list therefore ought to be corrected by the addition of seventeen names. Only one clergyman has indicated that he wished his name to be removed, the Rev. J. P. Du Hamel. Will you have the kindness to publish this, with the seventeen names to be added? They are alphabetically arranged so that clergymen who wish to do so can insert them in their printed lists.

THE BAPTISMAL RUBRIC

To the Editor of The Living Church:

The letter in a recent number of THE LIVING CHURCH, entitled, "Is It Rubric Breaking?" by "Y. Y. K.," calls attention to a subject which I think is worthy of further consideration.

The rubric directing that Baptism be administered at Morning or Evening Prayer "immediately after the last Lesson," is perfectly plain and free from ambiguity, so that nonconformity therewith cannot be due to a legitimate interpretation of the rubric as meaning other than what the words declare. Reasons can be given, of course, why the administration is relegated to an obscure and non-rubrical time, the principal one being that of convenience, thereby not prolonging the service at Morning or Evening Prayer. But this and other reasons assigned for disregarding the rubric are of little or no weight when considered in the light of the very weighty reasons there are for conforming to the rubric.

Baptism is the act wherein its subject is "made a member of Christ, the child of God, and an inheritor of the kingdom of heaven," and the whole theory of the Church, as expressed in the words of the office and the rubrics, is that the grafting of new stock into the living vine is not only an act of public importance and interest, but of great teaching value to those who witness it. Not only does the rubric direct the administration to be at Morning or Evening Prayer, but the presence of the congregation is implied in the words of the office, and in the Baptism of Those of Riper Years is explicitly mentioned: "Well-beloved, who are come hither desiring to receive Holy Baptism, ye have heard how the congregation hath prayed," etc.

Owing to the very prevalent practice of administering Baptism at other times, many Church people (to say nothing of strangers casually or occasionally present) seldom witness it, thus being deprived of participation in the ceremony, and consequently failing to be taught the great truths of Holy Writ so plainly enunciated in the Baptismal Office; for in the administration of Baptism the Church appears as the teacher, setting forth a perpetual object lesson of Christian truth and duty. If this office were generally used at Morning or Evening Prayer the Bible doctrine of Baptism would be kept continually before the people, their minds would be instructed thereby, as they are intended to be by the office itself, which cannot be so effectively done in any other way, and thus a great addition would be made to Christian intelligence and apprehension of the significance of Baptism. The baptized portion of the congregation would then be "remembering always that Baptism doth represent unto us our profession; which is, to follow the example of our Saviour Christ, and to be made like unto Him," while those having children whose Baptism has been deferred would be reminded of neglected duty, and thus perchance be led to its performance.

As the order for Morning Prayer trains the worshippers in habits of reverence, and familiarizes to them Holy Writ, so the Baptismal Office would inculcate and make familiar wholesome theology.

"CHURCH TEACHING"

To the Editor of The Living Church:

In your issue of July 22d, there is an article under the above caption, making serious charges against a rector, his bishop, and his whole corps of Sunday school teachers. The article is written in such a way as to avoid responsibility, and yet to destroy good names. It is dated in my parish, and thus adroitly attempts my injury.

Permit me to say that if it is intended for the parish in which it is dated, so far as it reflects on the Bishop or on my corps of teachers, it is thoroughly unjust, or if it is intended to mean me in its charges relative to pulpit teaching and in the instruction of candidates for Confirmation, it is not true in a single instance or particular.

I trust that this will suffice from me.

HERMAN C. DUNCAN,
Rector of St. James.

Alexandria, La.

To Correspondents

C. T.—When a priest Celebrates more than once on the same day he must, undoubtedly, receive each time. The rubric of our Communion Office requires the priest to receive when he has consecrated, and in this it follows the analogy of every Catholic Liturgy. Canons were formerly made against duplicating, but no permission was ever given for a celebrant to omit taking the Sacrament. On the contrary, penalties were inflicted in such cases. Landon's Manual of the Councils is a convenient handbook. The point is that the celebrant is required to fulfill in his own person every act involved in the rite, consecration, oblation, reception.

Ordinations

On the 8th Sunday after Trinity, in St. Paul's church, St. Paul, Minn., Bishop Gilbert ordained to the diaconate Mr. George M. P. Pridham, a graduate of Cambridge University. During the last five years Mr. Pridham has been lay-reader at St. Paul's. Hereafter he will devote his Sundays to the upbuilding of the Church at South St. Paul. The Rev. Dr. Wright presented the candidate.

GILLENDER.—Entered into rest, at Warehouse Point, Conn., July 17th, 1899, Annie Gillender, of New York city.

Appeals

(Legal title [for use in making wills]: THE DOMESTIC AND FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY OF THE PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH IN THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.)

Domestic missions in seventeen missionary districts and forty-one home dioceses; missions among the colored people; missions among the Indians; foreign missions in China, Japan, Africa, Greece, and Haiti;

support of the clergyman of this Church appointed to counsel and guide the presbyters and readers in Mexico.

Provision must be made for the salaries and traveling expenses of twenty-four bishops, and stipends of 1,700 missionary workers, besides the support of schools, orphanages, and hospitals. Contributions are, moreover, asked specifically for the salaries of workers and support of schools in Mexico. One thousand dollars per month is the estimate of such expenses.

Remittances should be made to MR. GEORGE C. THOMAS, treasurer, 281 Fourth ave., New York. At present, please address communications to the REV. JOSHUA KIMBER, associate secretary.

Spirit of Missions, official monthly magazine, $1 a year.

THE church at New Richmond, Wis. (St. Thomas' church), was totally destroyed in the tornado which nearly wiped out that town, on June 12th. Nothing whatever remains, excepting a hole in the ground, and a mass of wreckage about it. Altar, vestments, seats, and everything, hopelessly gone. Nor was there any tornado insurance. We ask for help to rebuild, and begin our work anew. Money can be sent to the missionary-in-charge, the REV. W. A. HOWARD, JR., Star Prairie, Wis. (P. O.), or to the BISHOP OF MILWAUKEE, Milwaukee, Wis., who has been on the ground, has seen the woeful destruction, and who will guarantee this appeal.

THE Lake Superior copper country is on the boom. New mines are springing up on every hand, and the Church is offered a wonderful opportunity of winning souls for her Master. Two missionaries are to begin work in six of these new locations on Sept. 1st, and instead of being the last to enter the field, the Church is to be the first. We are able to promise each missionary six hundred dollars a year salary; but it is necessary that they should have houses in which to live, if they are to exist in a country where all the necessities of life are most expensive.

Five hundred dollars will build both houses, and we confidently appeal to the general Church for assistance in procuring homes for these men who are willing to sacrifice so much for Christ and His Church. Remittances should be sent to the BISHOP OF MARQUETTE, or to the Rev. J. E. CURZON, district presbyter of the Copper country, Houghton, Mich.

NEXT Ephphatha Sunday (Aug. 20th) rapidly approaches, with the usual reminder to parishes within the limits of the Mid-Western Deaf-Mute Mission that offerings are needed to meet its expenses.

THE REV. A. W. MANN,
General Missionary, Gambier, Ohio.

TWELFTH SUNDAY AFTER TRINITY, AUG. 20TH

The Church Mission to Deaf-Mutes, New York, appeals for special offerings from churches, and gifts from individuals, on this appropriate day.

REV. THOMAS GALLAUDET, D. D., General Manager, 112 West 78th st., New York City.

MR. WILLIAM JEWETT, Treasurer, 467 Broadway, New York City.

The Transfigured Face

BY W. B. C.

This was their earthly heaven—to gaze
Upon the Lord's Transfigured Face,
To catch amid these clouds, this night,
One fleeting glimpse of heavenly light;
With Moses and Elias, free
To view Divinest Majesty—

Ah! in the gray and darkling days,
In thickness of the earthly maze,
When every light awhile grows dim—
Transfigured there, but gaze on Him,
But feebly seek to touch His hem.
If sometimes it is hard to stem
The tide of bitter care and pain,
Trudge up yon holy mount again,
E'en though thy feet bleed on the way;
Behold afar the bright array,
The Sacred Face; and with new strength
Those feet shall gain the top at length.

But rare such visions!—oftener days
In which seems veiled the Sacred Face.
These sins and stains have woven the veil
That hides His glory; and a wall,
As if 'twere His last bitter cry,
May give to our sad quest reply.
Yet once again the clouds give place
To light on His Transfigured Face!

The Transfiguration

LET it be the joy and the glory of us Christians to have a faith or two altogether and absolutely, secretly and sacredly, our own. The world keeps its Christmas, its Easter, its Whitsuntide; puts its own gloss upon each, but keeps it still. The world keeps no Transfiguration. The 6th of August bears that name in the calendar, but no one notices it. "The secret of the Lord is with them that fear Him," let this be one part of it.

Marvelous, miraculous revelation! The Transfigured Lord, His countenance shining like the sun, and His raiment bright as the light! Two saints of the old world manifested in glory, representatives of earlier dispensations, speaking with Him of that decease which He should accomplish at Jerusalem, and in which each type of the law and each line of the Prophets was to find its interpretation and its fulfillment. What mysteries gather round the scene, who can wonder if the bewilderment of the three witnesses expressed itself in the dreamy proposal of one of them, to make there three tabernacles, and forget in an Elysium of enjoyment the sins and the woes of a world under their feet.—Dr. C. J. Vaughan.

ONE of the "woman's clubs" in New York has been debating the question: "Woman's clubs; are they inimical to home life?" The women who cannot get elected to clubs, or who are "old," and not "new women," say they are, but to unprejudiced observers the ordinary woman's club does not seem to be. Of course there are exceptions. An American woman was invited once to a meeting of one of the London woman's clubs, a very exclusive one, and she was highly entertained at seeing the members putting their feet (English feet, Hawthorne says, are anything but small) on the tables, and puffing cigars, with their hands in their pockets, while they were being harangued on the tyranny of man. We imagine, however, that all this roaring was just a harmless playing at bears, and that at home these good ladies were quiet and peaceable wives and mothers like other people. We know plenty of club women who have been much improved by their clubs, and being themselves improved, have improved their homes. American women, as a general thing, are better informed than their companion men, and they owe a great deal of it to the innumerable woman's clubs. Certainly the having a place where a woman can get a good meal in good company when away from home, need not militate against her having good meals for those at home, and being there to grace them quite as regularly as the non-"clubbesses." The question: "Would mixed clubs keep up more effectually social life?" is a very thorny one. There are lions in the way, and we all know that it would be a brutum fulmen to stick up a sign in the club reading room, "Flirting not allowed." Woman's clubs have, however, come to stay, and we had better make the best of them.

WE remember a lovely boat ride on the Thames, and at the very loveliest part of it, encountering a raft moored, on which was a huge wooden cube, labeled "Armour's Cooked Corn Beef." It "riled us considerably," and on our return we interviewed Mr. Armour, and begged him to have it taken away. He laughed, and said he could not control the advertising firms. We remember also registering a solemn vow in Holland that under no circumstances whatever, even if parched with thirst in an African desert, would we drink a certain kind of cocoa, the merits of which were set forth on every "coign of vantage" throughout the length and breadth of the Netherlands. We therefore hail with joy the formation of a society in England to squelch the nuisance. It is called "Scapa," a word which you need not look up in your Greek dictionary, for it is simply made up of the first letters in the phrase, "Society for checking the abuses of public advertising." It has secured the proper number of dukes, etc., etc., to be patrons, and The Westminster Review has put in an article written by its moving spirit, Richardson Evans. We copy a good many English things we had better let alone, but surely here is something worth while, for we, too, agonize under this thing. Is there no American Evans ready to break a lance for us? Let it be quickly done, or the Paliades will be gone.

THAT very progressive institution, the University of Chicago, which every year shows more plainly what a factor it is now, and means still more to be, in American education, has suffered greatly from the "free speech" of some of its professors. It has lately made an official pronouncement on that subject, as follows: "The utterances which any professor shall make in public are to be regarded as representing his opinions only." The university probably thinks it can wash its hands of responsibility in this way, but it will find that no resolution soap will entirely remove the stain. Free speech is all very well, and one of our most cherished rights, but if a professor will air his private views without regard to any one but himself, his talk will re-act on his college and make it unpopular. If two or three distinguished members of a college faculty get off unpatriotic or wildly socialistic speeches, the general public will certainly conclude that the whole college is "tarred with the same stick." All the "de-officializing" resolutions in the world cannot cure this, and professors and preachers, and army and navy officers, must have the necessity of a "close mouth" hammered into them, or else they will keep their colleges, and dioceses, and army and navy boards, in very hot water.

"DOES it encourage you," asks an esteemed correspondent, "who work so wisely and faithfully for us, to know that your influence does not stop at church doors? That it works outside and beyond them in ways that you may not suspect? I know personally many who read you openly now, who a very few years ago considered you a 'temptation,' and read you very surreptitiously. Which is it, the thin edge of the wedge opening the way for truth to enter, or a bolt, drawing Christians more closely and firmly together? I can never thank you enough for all you have done for me by your words of comfort and instruction."

ONE incident in the official career of the late Bishop Perry should go down, with perhaps many more, in the history of the Church. It occurred on the opening of the General Convention of 1862, the first which occurred during the Civil War. Dr. Perry was secretary of the House of Deputies. He began the roll of the dioceses, calling in a loud voice, "Alabama!" A member immediately objected that, as the Southern States had seceded, the Southern dioceses had no representation in the Convention. "There is no secession in the Church," shouted the secretary, and he proceeded to call every Southern diocese in its place. He settled then and there the whole question. There was no secession.

ONE occasionally comes across some quaint advertisements in the columns of the daily and weekly press, but the one below, taken from a contemporary in South London, England, is remarkable for its want of clearness:

WANTED, in a quiet Home, a Christian lady (furnished or unfurnished). Enquire at 14 Montpelier-road, Queen's-road, Peckham.

The following found a place in the columns of The Guardian.

WANTED NURSE, single-handed. Lady's first baby. Small house in country, 20 miles from London. Must be reliable, willing and contented, blue eyes. Wages £30. Good needlewoman, not more than thirty years of age.

IT is related that a certain bishop met an English sportsman in Calcutta. The former was visiting the native Christians under his care, and the latter was after large game. In the conversation between the two, the sportsman remarked that he had met no native Christians in his travels, and did not believe that missionary work was producing any effect. "But," said the Bishop, "have you seen any tigers?" The Englishman replied: "Oh, yes, hundreds of them." "Well," responded the Bishop, "I myself have traveled extensively through India, and I have seen hundreds of native Christians, but I have not seen one tiger; shall I therefore say there are no tigers in India? It is probable that we have both seen just what we were looking for."

PHILANTHROPIC institutions abound now-a-days, but some are more suggestive and helpful in their methods of working than others. A. M. Bonjean is one of the most remarkable of French philanthropists. For many years he has given his time entirely to charitable organizations especially intended to help children. A correspondent of Harper's Bazar tells us that he does not believe in heredity. He thinks that a child's instincts are created by his environment, not by his inheritance. Any child can be absolutely changed from bad to good by the right kind of moral influence, by affection, and by confidence.

HERE are two illustrations of M. Bonjean's method of reform: At one of his institutions he had a number of very young boys who had been in prison for incendiaries. He called them to him and represented that they had forfeited their right to the consideration of the world by endangering the lives and fortunes of other people. The only way in which they could get it back was by doing something, in their turn, in case of fire, to help and save others. So he made them into a company of firemen, to which he presented a fire-engine. One night there was a fire, and M. Bonjean went out to see how his band were acquitting themselves. Part were at the engine, and part were making a chain to pass pails of water from the river to the burning house, of which the end, plunged up to his waist in water, was a little chap of eight, who had had three incendiaries to his credit. It was a cold November night, and M. Bonjean noticed that the boy was shivering. "You must not stay any longer," he said, "you are risking your life. What does it matter that I am risking my life if I am only making reparation?" was the answer.

ANOTHER boy had been convicted of stealing. One of M. Bonjean's first acts was to send him to pay a bill. "I trust you perfectly," he said, and he counted out six hundred francs in gold. The little fellow's face flushed, but he took the money and went off. When he came back he was waving the receipted bill. "I paid it," he said. "I knew you would," was M. Bonjean's answer, and the philanthropist has lived to see this child grow up, in a position of trust, and happily married, with boys of his own.

NORWAY has passed a law prohibiting the sale of tobacco to any boy under sixteen years of age, without a signed order from an adult relative or employer. Foreign travelers are also forbidden to offer cigarettes to boys, and make themselves liable to prosecution if they do so. The police are required to confiscate all the pipes, cigars, and cigarettes, of boys who smoke in the public streets.

IN 1610, by command of Lord Delaware, the second church was built, which is thus described by an old chronicler: "It is in length threescore foote, in breadth, twenty-foure, and shall have a chancel in it of cedar; and a Communion Table of Blake Walnut, and all the pews in it of cedar *

* * a pulpit of the same, with a font hewn hollow, like a Canoe, with two Bels at the West End. The Captain General doth cause it to be kept passing sweete, and trimmed up with divers flowers, with a sexton belonging to it; and in it every Sunday we have sermons twice a day, and every Thursday a Sermon * * * and every morning at the ringing of a bell, about ten of the clock, every man addresseth himself to prayers, and so at foure of the clock before supper. Every Sunday, when the Lord Governor and the Captain General goeth to church, hee is accompanied with all the Counsellors, other officers; and all the gentlemen with a guard of Halberdiers, in his Lordship's livery, faire red clokes to the number of fifty, boath on each side and behinde him: and being in the church his Lordship hath his seat in the Quier, in a green Velvet chaire, with a cloath, with a velvet cushion spread on the table before him, on which he kneeleth, and on each side set his Counsell, Captaines and officers, each in their place." Such was the ritual and the rule of divine service in Virginia in 1610. It sets before us a picture hardly in keeping with the representations of certain writers who portray those early colonists as a profane, profligate, and godless set.

Notes From "Eaglesnest"

VI.

OLD MISSION lies on the east side and near the end of the long and narrow peninsula which divides Grand Traverse Bay. The harbor is open only to the south, shut in on three sides, and sheltered from the worst storms. Sometimes in a north gale, sailing vessels, and even steam barges, run in here from the great lake for shelter, and it is exciting to watch them (the schooners) beating their way in after they have turned the Point. Once I got my oars ready for a life-saving adventure, when a vessel was nearly capsizing in her efforts to make the harbor. Some of our young men are so venturesome with their canoes that they do capsize, but they hang on to the upturned boats until some one comes to the rescue. The daughter of one of the neighbors in the "Resort" saved several shipwrecked crews some years ago, rowing out in a stiff gale, pulling the half-drowned men into her boat, and towing their canoes ashore with them. Her name is Grace Darling! Her father, Mr. C. W. Pierce, of Chicago, is one of the most daring canoe navigators of the lake, but he never capsizes. To be for hours within an inch of drowning every minute, is considered finesport! I have sailed in many waters and in all sorts of weather, but I should feel as safe to be smoking in a powder magazine, as to be sailing in a canoe when there is even a single-reef breeze blowing.

We have been very fortunate to have no one drowned in our harbor; but our dockmaster, Mr. Bagley, lost his dear boy last spring from our little steam vessel, Onekama, when it was many miles from home. We read almost every day of boats capsized and people drowned, and they are generally young people. "Know nothing, fear nothing," is the true proverb. Every boy thinks he can "sail a boat," and every girl delights to show her sweet confidence in the reckless young ignoramus who invites her to go out with him. If there comes a squall he is as helpless as he would be in a balloon. When there is no squall he often finds some other way of blundering into the water. If he would only drown himself we could forgive him. The girl is the one who generally is drowned.

These inland waters are more dangerous for amateur sailing than the estuaries of the sea. The winds are more changeable, and the fresh water is more quickly whipped into dangerous anger than the salt water. I have seen a black squall come up out of the west, almost without warning except to the sailor's watchful eye, which lashed the waters of the bay into a white foam, the line of it moving on as clearly defined as the edge of an ice-floe. Even a row-boat would be capsized unless it were kept head on, and then it would be blown out into the lake.

Even those who have lived near the water for years, and have been accustomed to boating, sometimes find themselves in great peril. We were startled one night after retiring, by a knocking and a sobbing at the door of our cottage, and opening it, found Mrs. Robinson and two little children, chilled and dripping, shivering and crying, having barely escaped being blown out of the harbor. They were returning from the postoffice when overtaken by the squall. The woman quickly placed the children in the bottom of the boat, and struggled to hold head to the wind and to make the shore. But the frail craft was driven before the gale. As the darkness closed down upon them the boat was filling with water, and seemed doomed to pass the Point and drift out to certain destruction in the open sea. With a desperate last effort, the mother threw all her strength upon one oar, the boat swerved and drifted upon the beach. As soon as the shipwrecked family were warmed and rested, they were taken home. Meantime, the alarm had been sounded at the dock by the anxious father, and a steam tug was sent screaming out into the darkness and tempest to find the missing wife and children. There was a happy family that night in the old farmhouse. I should think they would all look twice into the sky before they again leap into a boat.

Book Reviews and Notices

Helps to Godly Living: Being Devotional Extracts from the Writings and Addresses of the Rt. Hon. and Most Rev. Frederick Temple, D. D., Lord Archbishop of Canterbury. Selected and Arranged, with His Grace's Permission, by J. H. Burn, B. D. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co. 1899. Price, $1.25.

In this closely-printed and neat volume is included some of the best thought of the distinguished Archbishop. The selections are brief, just the thing to take up of a morning, or the last thing at night, in order that one may be charged, so to speak, with a clear, pure thought, or given something upon which to muse when work for the day is done. The whole book breathes of a courageous spirit which will not blink at difficulties, but will look them full in the face, and meet them with a cool intellect, with powerful argument, with the free admission of the inscrutable, and with a firm faith, entirely untainted with emotionalism or sentimentality. The range of subjects is comprehensive. The book is theological, speculative, and intensely practical.

The Romance of Christian Work and Experience. By W. Hay M. H. Aitken. New edition. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co. 1899. Price, 82.

If one wanted an absolute contrast to the quiet, clear, and sturdy book of the Archbishop of Canterbury, noted above, they would have it in this "Romance of Christian Work and Experience," by the Rev. Mr. Aitken. Both books illustrate the wide divergencies which yet may be included in the embracing circle of the Church. In the one book, you have clear thought, quiet statement, not a tinge of exaggeration, and a stern truthfulness which is supernatural. In the other, you are drenched with emotions from the very first. It is a recital of wonders and stories which often make great claims upon one's credulity. You are expected to receive all as absolutely true, stories of conversions, of miraculous interventions, of mistakes turning into designed miracles, some verging on the ludicrous, others close to the edge of prohibited irreverence, and all are told with that air of perfect assurance which has a close affinity with similar recitals in Romish legends and the thaumaturgy of new-sprung modern sects. Much of what is told may be capable of proof. Emotional natures jump to conclusions often, and make statements which, though not true, are yet not wholly false, for they are true to the imaginations of those who relate them.

There is an inevitably uncomfortable aspect of the book in the fact that Mr. Aitken himself tells his own story. We never find in Holy Writ, an apostle, a preacher, or an evangelist telling of wonders he had performed. The acknowledgment of having performed wonderful works seems to have been wrung from the heart of St. Paul, as an unwilling admission, as proof of his disputed apostleship. It was always the people who greatly wondered at the miracles of the New Testament. Those who wrought them were always silent. If the people do not recognize and acknowledge the miraculous in Christian work and experience, of their own motion, it is better to keep silent about such miracles. One redeeming feature of the book is the courageous assertion therein that the age of miracles is not past. "Let us take courage," the author says. "The age of miracles is not past, and never will pass, so long as God remains a living Person, and Jesus Christ continues 'the same to day and forever,' as He was in the 'yesterday' of His Incarnation. Christian life is full of miracle, where faith is ever drawing on the resources of Him whose name is 'Wonderful.'" The Archbishop's clear, cold, rational, and utterly unemotional book is a splendid antidote to the heated imagination of the other, and both have their place as helps to study and to work.

Of Divers Troubles in Our Midst. New York: Longmans, Green & Co. Pp. 29. Price, 40 cts.

This quaintly worded dialogue between Senex, Catholicus, and Evangelicus, represents an earnest effort to reconcile the contending Church parties of to-day, and secure a better understanding of difficulties. Such conciliatory activity is greatly needed in England just now. We trust that there is many a Senex pleading in such earnest, loving tones as these that his younger brethren may compose their differences and be at peace.

A Spring Song. By I. Nash. Now again published, with sundry pictures by L. Leslie Brooke. London: J. M. Dent & Co.; New York: E. P. Dutton & Co. Price, 60 cents.

A little song which first saw the light in 1600, and now sounds out again in all its quaintness; illustrated by very pretty pictures, charmingly colored, and well drawn.

The Break-up of China. With an Account of its Present Commerce, Currency, Waterways, Armies, Railways, Politics, and Future Prospects. By Lord Charles Beresford. With Portraits and Maps. New York and London: Harper & Bros. 1899. Price, $3.

The exhaustive title does not, after all, give an adequate idea of the contents of this interesting volume of nearly 500 pages, by an author who needs no introduction to the public. Rear-Admiral Lord Charles Beresford was the right man to send to China, since the object of those who sent him was to find out the facts about that country, for the guidance of the British mercantile public not less than for that of the British government. The author seems to have made a thorough investigation of the whole subject. He believes that a combination of the great Powers to preserve the integrity of the Chinese Empire is necessary, if both foreign trade and peace are to be maintained. He opposes the "Spheres of Influence" policy, and advocates "The Open Door" policy. He also believes that the internal government of China, its army and police, and its civil service, need reorganizing under European tutelage, in order to afford necessary protection to trade. The book is packed full of valuable information, and is written in a terse, vigorous, lucid style. It ought to be read, and probably will be read, by the American public with as much interest as by Englishmen, as our growing trade with China, and our enlarged relations with the Orient, render it a peculiarly opportune work. The maps are excellent, and the cover is significantly embellished with the English and American flags, and the Chinese dragon on a yellow ground—but the dragon is beneath the flags.

The Market Place. By Harold Frederic. New York: Frederick A. Stokes Company. Price, $1.50.

This is the story of a stock-broker who succeeded in floating a bogus Mexican rubber company on the London Stock Exchange, and made a large fortune in a few weeks. His experiences are very exciting, and the exposure of the methods of stock speculators is clearly and forcibly described by the writer. The love story that forms part of the book is a question of titles and money. In this case, the broker has the money, which the lady with the title is willing to accept. The illustrations by Harrison Fisher are excellent, and the binding of the book adds to the attractiveness of the work.

Benedicite, or the Song of the Three Children. Being Illustrations of the Power, Beneficence, and Design Manifested by the Creator in His Works. By G. C. Child Chaplin, M.D. Thirteenth Edition. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co. 1899. Price, $1.50.

This present "thirteenth edition" is a witness of how well this devout and admirable treatise has been appreciated by thoughtful people. It takes up in order, that sublime hymn of the morning service, "O all ye works of the Lord, bless ye the Lord: praise Him, and magnify Him forever," and shows, through all the creation therein invoked, the Power, Beneficence, and Design displayed by the Creator in His works. It will be found a mine of illustration, from existing phenomena; and most useful in the study.

Periodicals

The fiction number of Scribner's Magazine possesses a very handsome cover. The color work in this issue is very fine. The short stories are representative of some of the best American writers—Richard Harding Davis, Henry Van Dyke, Thomas Nelson Page, etc. A touching contribution is that by E. S. Thompson, on "The Trail of the Sandhill Stag." John La Farge has an article on "The Art of Saying Things from a Painter's Point of View." Quiller-Couch's serial is continued; also Stevenson's letters.

"Josiah Allen's Wife" (Marietta Holley) has finished her new story, and the first installment is published in the August Ladies' Home Journal. The Rev. Newell Dwight Hillis, D.D., has an interesting article in this issue, on "The Diffusion of Happiness through Conversation," and Mrs. Burton Kingsland and Emily D. Striebert write of "With the Children on Sunday"—their diversions and instruction; "What Can be Done with an Old Farmhouse" pictures how an old building may be artistically remodeled at small cost. The latest feminine fancies in dress are set forth in "The Gossip of a New York Girl," and Emily Wight writes of the "Newest Styles in Hairdressing" and "Laces for Dress Trimmings." Mrs. S. T. Rorer's cooking lesson is on "Cold Dishes for Hot Weather," and Mr. and Mrs. Edward B. Warman's health talks are on timely themes.

The Atlantic for August devotes an unusual amount of space to fiction, for besides Miss Johnston's interesting serial, Mr. Hopkinson Smith has a patriotic story, "The Man with the Empty Sleeve," Mrs. Phelps-Ward tells of little Adahy and her "silver Yorkshire," while two others furnish both humor and pathos. In "The Break Up of China and Our Interest in It," are editorially discussed the present conditions prevailing in the Flowery Kingdom, and the question whether it is for the benefit of the United States to deal with China as a unit under her own flag, or as a fragment under many flags. W. Cunningham discusses the prospect of universal peace, in connection with the Peace Congress now in session. In "His Brother's Brother," Colonel T. W. Higginson writes delightfully about the late John Holmes, the less famous, but to many minds not less able, younger brother of the Autocrat. Jacob A. Riis passes from the problem of the tenement house and takes up that of the tenant; and John Burroughs, in "Thou Shalt Not Preach," discusses Tolstoi's essay on "What is Art."

In The Century for August, "The Present Situation in Cuba" is graphically stated in a brief article by Major-Gen. Leonard Wood. John Burroughs gives a fascinating glimpse of the wild life about his slab-sided cabin near the Hudson River, at West Park. In "The River of Tea," Miss E. R. Scidmore writes of the Yangtze-Kiang, and especially of the city of Hankow, where Russian and Siberian merchants have supplanted the English, though the tea-tasters, "for reasons not flattering to Russian character," continue to be English only. In an illustrated paper on "The Churches of Auvergne," Mrs. Van Rensselaer introduces effectively the picturesque episode of Peter the Hermit preaching the first crusade. Jonas Stadling's picturesque "People of the Reindeer," gives adventure on snow-shoes and reindeer sleds; and something more than mere adventure is to be heard of in John R. Musick's description at first hand of a town "In the Whirl of a Tornado," and the accompanying learned article on "Tornadoes," by Cleveland Abbe. There are many other good things in this issue.

In Time of Sickness

A STORY OF THE NIGER DELTA

ONE afternoon of the dry season, when forest and swamp lay sweltering beneath the fierce rays of the African sun, a cottonwood canoe slid down a yellow river winding through the watery forests of the Niger delta. Six woolly-haired Krooboyes, with a broad blue stripe tattooed down the centre of each forehead, and the perspiration glistening upon their ebony skin, wearily dipped the paddles in time to the croon of a chanty; while a stalwart negro whose features were finer than those of any coastwise tribe, encouraged them from the stern. He was a Moslem Hausa, from the far kingdom of Sokoto, which lies beyond the fever-belt, and wore a sergeant's uniform of the British Protectorate whom he served as instructor to the Yoru's troops.

In the shade of a palm-leaf awning beside him, a white man, wasted almost to a skeleton by fever, lay gasping for breath, his lined forehead and haggard face beaded with clammy dampness. "Give me a drink, Amadu," he said feebly; and the negro, gently raising his head, held a calabash of lukewarm water, wherein green lines floated, to the blackened lips.

"Thanks," said the sufferer, faintly. "It's no use going further, Amadu. I'll never reach the coast. Make for the nearest factory—at least I'll hear a white man's voice."

The sergeant gently packed the palm mat beneath his master's shoulders, and hailed the Krooboyes in the coast palaver: "Paddle faster, there, you bushmen. Factory live one time, and then you catch plenty sleep."

The worn-out negroes obeyed, and the canoe slid on faster down the muddy river, which shimmered about them like molten brass. On either hand the dingy foilage of the mangroves rolled away as far as eye could see, their crawling roots rising out of foul depths of bubbling slime, the exhalations from which bring disease and death to the unfortunate European who breathes them. Meantime, Henry Alton lay very still, the fierce sunrays beating down upon him through the tattered awning until his karki uniform seemed to burn the wasted limbs beneath. For many months he had done his best to maintain peace and order among the unruly tribesmen of the remoter swamps, refusing, in spite of weakness and fever, to leave the unhealthy station until an officer of sufficient experience could be sent to relieve him. With this man, as with others of his kind, work came first, health and safety taking a second place; and now, when it seemed too late to save his life, he was being carried to the coast, burning in the grip of the malaria. Sergeant Amadu who came of the intelligent and powerful races of the Hinterland, and he, had made many a risky march together, and there was thus the bond of a common endurance and courage between them.

Late that afternoon the clumsy craft slid alongside the landing of a little pile-raised factory, standing on a strip of firm earth which rose like an island from the quaking swamps. A flotilla of trade canoes lay beside the hard-trodden bank, and a swarm of sable merchants, some gorgeously and wonderfully attired in cast-off European finery, and others wearing little besides nature's garb, clamored about the glaring white-washed oil shed. Sergeant Amadu, lifting his master in his arms—the burden was very light—thrust them contemptuously aside, and climbed the factory stairway, where a burly European, with a stamp of alcohol as well as fever upon his yellow face, stared in surprise. The explanation was brief, and presently Alton lay gasping in a canvas lounge upon the shady veranda, where a great purple-flowered creeper climbed towards the projecting eaves, with a cloud of painted butterflies hovering around it.

"You are very good," he said faintly, when the trader with rough kindness had bathed his haggard face with vinegar. "It was hardly fair to bring you extra work in weather like this, but it's a very long way to the coast, and the heat in the canoes was more than I could stand."

"We'll do the best we can; we have all of us the same risk to run," was the answer. "Just wait till I find my partner, Ellory. He knows more about physic than I do, and it's just as well he does, for he's half-dead himself most of the time—but what can you expect in a place like this?"

Alton smiled feebly, and trader Lee hurried toward the store shed, where he found a gaunt and sickly man haggling with the bush traders over rolls of Manchester cotton and bottles of German potato spirit, and doing what he could to protect his property from wholesale loot. The galvanized sheeting overhead was too hot to touch, the atmosphere resembled that of the black hole of Calcutta, and a struggling, shouting crowd of Jakkery negroes wrangled and fought over whatever took their fancy, regardless of value or prior claims. The white man's forehead was seamed with lines of pain, and his lips twitched at times; but few Europeans can expect to escape from suffering among the steamy swamps, where there is always sickness, and trader Ellory had trying work to do.

When Lee related what had happened, he said briefly: "Well, I'll come and see. It will be dark soon, and I could not have kept this up much longer." Then he raised his voice: "Trade palaver set. Get out, all of you. Hyah, Krooboyes, turn them bushmen out one time."

A few ebony-skinned laborers from the distant Liberian beaches drove the bush traders who clawed at each other's property, and occasionally at a luckier neighbor's throat, towards the door, until at last the place was clear of the turbulent, shouting mob. Lee carefully locked the shed, and when he rejoined his partner on the veranda, Ellory said: "It's no use, Alton is beyond anything I can do, and he can't last more than a day or two at a temperature like that. It seems hard he should go under now—on his way home, after all he has suffered in that deadly hole. The government surgeon is away south, so there's only one man can help him—and that man is Langton, of the mission."

Ellory was of a finer stamp than his companion, and there was a look of compassion in his sunken eyes as he leaned over the balustrade, staring down the shimmering river.

"We can't let the poor fellow die," said Lee, reflectively. "There's nothing to be done but send and ask Langton to come, though this is about the last place he would care to visit after that trouble about the Hamburg gin. However, the man is genuine, and I suppose it's the medicine that gives him the power he has. I don't like asking a favor from those fellows, though—what was it he said we were?"

For sufficient reasons the relations between trader and missionary are frequently strained in Western Africa, and Ellory smiled grimly, as he answered: "Nothing very flattering; but you said too much, and it's his business, anyway. Langton was at the Kanu village last—usual thing, smallpox wiping them out by the dozen, and if he's alive he'll come, sick or well. One of us will have to watch Alton all the time, and if the other went those bush rascals would practically loot the place. No Krooboy would venture near Kanu alone just now; we'll have to send the Hausa."

When he had explained the matter, the big sergeant, Amadu, said gravely, in the semi-Arabic idiom of the Hinterland: "Why should I fear the pestilence? The sick officer man and I have been in many stricken villages where our people died. This infidel teacher shall heal my master, if I bring him by the neck."

Ellory who understood in part, laughed softly, and presently the black soldier, worn out as he was with sleepless watching, departed in a cottonwood canoe to face another weary journey through the heat and steam of the swamps. When the woolly-haired canoe boys found out whither they were bound, they laid down the paddles and protested vigorously, for most of them had seen that particular plague at work upon an extensive scale. There is, however, little love lost between one West African race and another, while the northern Moslem look down upon the coastwise heathen as the dust beneath their feet, so the big sergeant was not disposed to argue the matter. Seizing the spokesman who proceeded to set forth their views with true negro eloquence, he belabored him with a paddle, threatened the rest with worse things still, and seeing that he would probably be at least as good as his word, the Krooboy sullenly dipped the blades again.

On the following afternoon a sickly white man, with weary eyes, and the perspiration oozing through his thin duck garments, stood in a tepid, mud-walled hut of the Kanu village whose temperature was that of an oven. A brass-bound chest lay upon a quaintly carved Accra stool beside him, among a litter of phials, and Stephen Langton, pausing to damp his temples with some aromatic mixture, leaned heavily against the swish walls. It was long since he had enjoyed even a few hours' unbroken sleep, and what that means only those who have toiled day after day in the fever-land, when the thermometer registers considerably more than one hundred, can understand. If it was hot inside the hut, it was even worse outside, and the raw-green palm fronds above the palaver square were outlined in lace-like tracery against a brassy sky. The white dust flung back a dazzling glare, and a group of naked Jakkeries, waiting admittance to the hut, crouched among it in stolid despair. Many bore the scars of a scourge which decimates the native tribes. Others were crippled by the horrible Guinea worm, which thrives amid the muscles of the human leg, or had their feet eaten to the ankles by the boring jigger insect, and all were sick or brought petitions for aid from those who lay dying in the stifling huts. And this is not an exceptional state of affairs, for if the mortality among Europeans in Western Africa is great, among the natives it is greater still, though even the scourge of the pestilence fails to teach the tribesmen that the penalty for drunkenness, slothfulness, and dirt is death. The sacred Ju Ju tree behind them was hung over with curious as well as repulsive offerings, and smeared with the blood of fowls; but the Jakkery is not altogether foolish. Thus, although the villagers were careful to propitiate their fetiche gods, they were also shrewd enough to notice that those who sought aid from the black priests died, while the white man's patients frequently recovered.

Presently Langton, glancing down, saw a huge yellow-striped spider crawling across his boot, evidently in search of an opening through which to insert its envenomed mandibles. Shaking it off with no undue hurry, he quietly set his foot upon it. "It would have served me right, when there is so much to do," he said, for a European soon learns to think aloud in the loneliness of Africa. Then there was a clamor of voices outside, and a tall negro in travel-stained uniform of yellow karki entered the hut.

"Officer man live for die in Sulu factory. You come one time. There be hurry or them bush 'tief Krooboy run away with canoe," he said, brusquely and authoritatively in the "coast palaver." Like others of his kind, Sergeant Amadu confined his respect to the government officers, and classified all other Europeans as "white bushmen."

Stephen Langton smiled a little. "I am not a servant of the government, so orders are not sent me by the white officers, and here are many sick," he answered in the idiom of the Hinterland, for this man had learned to speak with many tongues. "Tell me clearly what your message is."

The Hausa, looking at him wonderingly, continued with more respect, and when his story was told, Langton said: "At sunset we will start. I have also the lives of these to answer for." As he did so, the hurried splash of paddles came through the superheated air, and with a wrathful cry the soldier sprang out of the hut and ran towards the landing. He arrived too late. A long canoe shot out into the stream, and went flying up the muddy river as fast as the terror-stricken Krooboy who had seen enough to frighten much braver men, could whirl the splashing paddles and drive her through the water. Then Langton laughed softly at the fierce gestures of the man who hurled unheeded threats of vengeance after them from the bank. "It's only natural, after all," he said, as he went back to his work.

THE Archbishop of Canterbury is pre-eminent among English prelates in his dislike of pomp and decoration. Once when the guest of a country clergyman, he was annoyed by the display of silver candlesticks in his room. After his departure, these silver candlesticks were nowhere to be seen. The distressed clergyman at once wrote to the primate, telling him of his loss, and adding: "Can you tell us what has happened?" The reply came by telegraph from the Archbishop: "Poor, but honest. Look in the chest of drawers."

MR. MCKINLEY'S hesitation about gratifying his growing desire to play golf is largely due, the gossips say, to a fear of the kodak fiends who would be sure to get a snap shot at the President of the United States in knee breeches, and other clothes which might be thought undignified.

CHAPTER XVII.

THE SHADOW LIFTS

THERE was no formal reinstatement of the recreant member into the S. D. S., but somehow the social policy of the Sisterhood seemed to have undergone a complete revolution, for Mollie was received with open arms, and not a day passed but what saw the Hardy equipage before the little green house, and every one of the girls vied in lavishing loving attentions on Madge Ferrall, and Mollie smiled in a knowing, superior kind of way, and said she had known they would come to their senses some day.

Headed by the Gray boys, the Excelsiors had called in a body to pay their homage to the heroine, and the honored president had fairly outshone himself in his speech of eulogy and congratulation; and Tony had blushed quite as red as Madge during the ceremony, and looked as happy as she over the boys' praise for his dear little sister.

Madge had the least to say of any one. Pale and quiet, she lay on the lounge in the sitting room, her arm bandaged and splinted, longing for the days to pass so that she could be well and strong again, not so much on account of the work, for Tony had plunged into the housework like a Trojan into battle, and every day brought delicacies from the great house on the bluff for the invalid and for Mrs. Ferrall. So there was no cause for worry over the work. It was the shadow that was growing darker, stealing slow but sure about the little home, and Madge, seeing it plainer now than ever before, would lie with wide, tearless eyes, watching her mother's sweet, sad face, and feeling herself, oh, so helpless and powerless to break the gloom. Not a word had she breathed to any one of the weight on her heart, not even to Mollie, but one day when Virginia was beside her as usual, reading in her low, sweet voice, she glanced up suddenly, and saw tears shining on Madge's long lashes.

"Oh, how thoughtless I am," she said tenderly. "Does your arm pain you so much, Madge?"

Madge shook her head, her lips trembling, and Virginia, laying aside the book, placed her arms around the slim little form and drew it to her.

"Tell me what it is, dear," she whispered, "perhaps I can help you."

"No, you can't," Madge answered hopelessly. "It's about mamma. Don't you see how she is going from us?"

For a few minutes Virginia did not answer, but sat still, her arms around Madge, her cheek pressed against hers, and in the shelter of the new-found sympathy, the latter let her tears come unrestrainedly. At last Virginia said softly, as she laid her back on the pillow: "I will help you, Madge."

Madge wondered how on earth she was going to do it, but she did not question the promise, only waited.

The next day brought a new visitor to th little green house—such a tall, broad shouldered visitor that he seemed to fill the tiny sitting room, and Madge blushed shyly as he seated himself beside her, and took both her hands in one of his large ones.

"You know, little one," he said, after he had been there a few minutes, "you know that I owe more to you than I can ever repay, because you saved Virgine's life for me. Now, please don't speak until I have finished. I can never repay you, I said, but I want you to tell me what you wish for most in your heart, and if I can, I will give it to you."

There was silence. Madge did not look at Mr. Hardy. Her gaze was fixed on the bit of blue sky just showing from the window. She was thinking hard, praying hard, too, in her heart. What she wished for most? Like a flash her heart had answered, but money could not buy her mother's life.

"There's Tony," she said at length, turning her eyes wistfully on Mr. Hardy, and meeting his kind glance. "Oh, I want him to be a splendid man so much." She paused and swallowed a lump that would rise in her throat, as she went on almost in a whisper, "I—I thought I'd like to have him go to college, or something like that, you know, sir."

Mr. Hardy bowed his head attentively.

"We will have to look after Tony, then," he said, "but Virginia has told me of something else, something about your mother, Madge, and after hearing what Dr. Sanford had to say, I have a plan to lay before you."

Madge raised herself on her good elbow and looked up at him, silent and expectant, all the hope of her heart in her eyes.

"The doctor says that if your mother were in a warm, balmy climate, for, say a year, she would recover," he went on, "and if you and Tony can do without her, why, we will send her South at once."

"Oh, we can get along all right," Madge cried eagerly. "I can take care of the house, you know I always do."

Mr. Hardy laughed in spite of himself. "That isn't in the plan at all," he said. "Virginia has everything arranged. You and Tony are to come to us, and Tony is to go into the bank."

Into the bank! Madge's fancy flew years ahead, and saw Tony already seated in solitary state at the president's desk, but she only lay back on the pillows and smiled.

"Will that do?" asked Mr. Hardy, and she nodded. She could not speak yet.

So the great change came in the Ferrall fortunes. At first the little mother had rebelled against the plan. She could not, would not, leave the children, she said, but Mrs. Hardy and Virginia pleaded the case so successfully, and told her that it was for their sakes she must go, that at last it was all settled. By Christmas the little green house was deserted, and its occupants spent the holidays at the house on the bluff.

There were great old times there on Christmas Eve. Excelsiors and Sisterhood girls were there in full force, and Madge was the guest of honor. The great house seemed more beautiful than ever, with its wealth of holly and laurel and evergreen, and the brilliant electric lights shining over all in the loveliest rainbow hues. And then the good things to eat! Bobbie Cherritt sat on a velvet ottoman, and distinguished himself so greatly by doing full justice to the eatables, that he was an accepted authority on the subject ever after.

"There were turkey sandwiches," he would begin whenever the boys wanted to live over the memory of that feast again, "and turkey without sandwiches, and sandwiches without turkey. Then there were nuts, not a few little skimpy, cracked affairs, but nuts—whole piles. And candy, u-u-m-m, boys, do you remember that candy? Then cake, all kinds, and fruit, all kinds, and ice cream, all kinds, and funny little arrangements that you pulled, and there was something dandy to eat inside. Oh, it was a great night!"

Madge thought so, too, when she fell asleep in the dainty, cosy room next to Virginia's, and Tony thought so, too, when Mr. Hardy took him aside into the library, and laid his hands on his shoulders as he looked down into his steady brown eyes, and told him of the bank.

Then came a day when the two stood alone on the little Ottawa depot platform, and watched the smoke of the train that was bearing the little mother far away to the sunny Southland and to health. Tony was crying, but Madge's eyes were solemn and dry, and she laid her arm around his shoulder in her quaint, motherly way, without speaking.

"It's only a year after all," Virginia said cheerily, when they rejoined her waiting in the pony trap, "and then she will be well."

"Well and strong," Madge echoed softly.

Virginie nodded as she gathered up the reins, and Lad and Lassie started off on a trot. "Yes, and now I have you all to myself for a year," she went on happily, "I mean to give you the jolliest time you ever had. We'll work and work in the Sisterhood until we have accomplished something worth having, and you will be with me all the time, and forget all about the little old green house and its troubles."

Madge pressed the hand that was laid lovingly over hers without answering. She was looking off to where the long bridge came in view, a narrow line drawn across the river, and at one end of it she could catch a glimpse of a chimney, a cold, lonely little chimney down by the marsh, and she thought to herself that one of the saddest things in the world for her would be to forget the little old green house with all its troubles, and the lessons of patience and self-denial and love that had laughed at and overcome those troubles.

THE END.

They All Got In

IT appears that one idle day the frog, the duck, the lamb, and the skunk started forth together to visit the show. Just what sort of a show it was, the chronicler doesn't state. Anyway, it was something that the queerly assorted quartet was anxious to attend, and they hopped and waddled and gamboled and trotted toward the big canvas inclosure with delightful throbs of anticipation.

Finally they reached the doortender, the frog leading the line.

Well, the frog had a greenback and passed right in.

The duck had a bill and followed the frog.

The lamb had four quarters and followed the frog and the duck.

But the unfortunate skunk was left on the outside. He only had a scent, and that was bad. Naturally he turned away, feeling pretty blue. As he was slowly going back over the hill, he met a hoop snake rolling along at a lively rate toward the show. The skunk greeted him, but the snake did not stop.

"Don't interrupt me," he cried over his shoulder. "I've got to do a turn, and I'm a little late," and he rolled along.

At the top of the hill the skunk noticed another old friend approaching. It was the sardine.

"Hello!" cried the sardine. "What's the matter?"

So the skunk told him.

"I can guess how you feel about it," said the sardine sympathetically. "I belong to the smelt family myself. But say, old fellow, you come right back and go in with me—I've got a box."

And the sardine and the skunk went back together.—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

BRAINS REPAIRED.

Polished and Sharpened by an Expert.

What are brains made of?

Albumen and delicate particles of Phosphate of Potash. Chemical examination of the perspiration and urine will determine the amount recent brain work by the amount of Phosphate of Potash found, for these delicate particles are thrown out from brain and nerve centers during nervous activity, and find their way back to earth through pores, kidneys, bowels, etc.

There is but one true way to repair the daily losses, and that way is to furnish the body with food containing a sufficient amount of these two elements. When the brain is not properly fed, the evidence is shown by a gradual decrease in the mental and physical powers of the body.

A food expert of the Postum Cereal Co., Lim., at Battle Creek, Mich., has prepared a crisp, dainty, and delicious food for the express purpose of quickly and surely rebuilding the brain and nerve centers, and has given it the name of Grape-Nuts.

This food is made by selecting the proper parts of grains and treating them by heat, moisture, and time in practically the same manner Nature does in the human body during the first part of digestion. The result is that the finished food not only contains the needed elements for brain building, but they are ready to be presented to Mother Nature in such a shape that she quickly absorbs and uses them. The good, solid, substantial results obtained every day by people who use Grape-Nuts, prove the facts.

The new food is found in all first-class grocery stores, and is one of the most toothsome and palatable novelties yet produced in the way of food, requiring no cooking or preparation of any sort; but, on the contrary, it is ready for immediate use, and suited to the athlete, brain worker, epicure, or invalid.

Finance and Commerce

THERE is no change to note in the condition or tendency of general financial and commercial affairs. The volume of general business continues to be beyond all precedents. The most satisfactory showing of last year is being eclipsed in all directions. The bank clearings are 30 per cent. more for the whole country leaving New York out. Railway earnings are greater in every quarter, and this without being enhanced by special operations in any direction. It is due to general movements of merchandise of every description. In the iron trade there is no falling off in demand, and supplies are everywhere unequal to the demand, and prices firm and advancing. Manufacturers are making but few contracts this side of 1900. That with present and prospective large productions this will soon change has been freely predicted by many of the best men in the trade, but so far actual pressing needs have outrun production, and there is almost a famine in iron. Prices are fairly steady in cotton and woolen goods. Raw cotton has changed but little, and speculation is at a low point with no material change in the outlook for the new crop.

In boots and shoes activity continues, and conditions are satisfactory. Wheat has undergone little change in price. There is no improvement in the indicated yield of winter wheat, and in some sections the quality has been lowered by rain or the grain is short. In the large spring wheat producing states in the Northwest, the developments of the past week necessitate further modification of previous sanguine expectations. Hot winds have lowered the conditions in South Dakota probably 15 per cent., while in Northern Minnesota and North Dakota the unfavorable conditions which prevailed during seeding and immediately following it, are now being felt, and the best authorities no longer predict a "bumper" crop, but something less than last year. Export demand has improved quite a little, and the English markets particularly show a hardening tendency. On the whole the prospects for the growing corn crop are good and prices still drag. Provisions have rallied from the lower prices of last week. Receipts of hogs are lighter and demand for products large.

Advices generally indicate that owing to the severe winter there are fewer young hogs in the country than last year. In Wall street prices have ruled firm. All the items of general business are brilliant in stocks, and the feeling has been strong. Prices have not responded freely to the bad news, and the improvement has been moderate and slow. The street is afraid of a tight money market. Demand for money at the banks is from all quarters and all kinds of business. The bank statement was again unfavorable. The decrease in reserves was not large but was only kept down by further decreasing loans. The tendency of the interest rate is higher. There have been no further exports of gold, but it is all the time within the range of possibility. The only serious labor troubles have been at Cleveland, and where disorderly manifestations still necessitate the presence of the State troops. The strike among the brick layers in Chicago is so far an affair of minor importance. Real estate men say the advance of fully 25 per cent. in the cost of building material has checked building operations for the time being.

Railways in China

THE proposed American railway line in China will, if existing agreements are carried out and the line constructed, prove an important link in a system connecting all of China with all of the outside world. Railway lines now existing, under construction, or projected, form a great circle swooping from Paris across Germany, Russia, and Siberia, to the Pacific, thence southwardly through China skirting the Pacific coast, thence eastwardly through Burmah and India to the Indian Ocean and the Arabian Sea, and pushing thence for passageway through Persia, to complete the grand circle of all the continent of Europe and Asia.

This great inter-continental belt line will touch the Pacific at Canton, the entrepot of the most densely populated part of China, at a distance of about 9,000 miles by rail from the great commercial centres of Europe, measuring by way of the trans-Siberian road now approaching completion. From Canton to the Philippines is but 600 miles, and to San Francisco, 6,381 miles, and to New York by way of a Nicaraguan canal, an all-water route, but 11,359 miles. Thus, whether by rail connection, or the less expensive method of transportation by water, the interest of the United States in the commerce of the Orient increases materially with the developments of the year, and prospective developments under discussion and serious consideration.

Interest in the commerce of China is increased materially by the recent developments in regard to transportation and privileges of foreigners. A recent publication of the Treasury Bureau of Statistics shows that over 3,000 miles of railway are now projected in China, over 3,000 miles of telegraph in operation, and that by recent action of the Chinese government, the waterways of China, its most important means of internal traffic at the present, have been opened to foreign commerce and foreign vessels. A recent edict announces that foreign vessels may navigate the streams of all provinces of China in which treaty ports are located, and as treaty ports are now distributed practically over the entire empire, this means that foreign vessels may navigate the streams of substantially all parts of that great country, and carry with them the citizens of other countries and their products. The natural waterways of China aggregate, it is estimated, fully 10,000 miles in length, and this, combined with the proposed railway systems when completed, will offer to other parts of the world commercial opportunities of great importance, whether reached by rail from the commercial centres of Europe, or by water from our Pacific or Atlantic seaboard.

IS IT A TRIFLE?

That Common Trouble, Acid Dyspepsia, or Sour Stomach.

Now Recognized as a Cause of Serious Disease.

Acid dyspepsia, commonly called heartburn or sour stomach, is a form of indigestion resulting from fermentation of the food. The stomach being too weak to promptly digest it, the food remains until fermentation begins, filling the stomach with gas, and a bitter, sour, burning taste in the mouth is often present. This condition soon becomes chronic, and being an everyday occurrence, is given but little attention. Because dyspepsia is not immediately fatal, many people do nothing for the trouble.

Within a recent period a remedy has been discovered, prepared solely to cure dyspepsia and stomach troubles. It is known as Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets, and is now becoming rapidly used and prescribed as a radical cure for every form of dyspepsia.

Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets have been placed before the public, and are now sold by druggists everywhere at 50 cents per package. It is prepared by the F. A. Stuart Co., Marshall, Mich., and while it promptly and effectually restores a vigorous digestion, at the same time is perfectly harmless and will not injure the most delicate stomach; but, on the contrary, by giving perfect digestion, strengthens the stomach, improves the appetite, and makes life worth living.

Hints to Flower Lovers

IT is an excellent plan to grow some plants having fine foliage and a low spreading habit in pots expressly for table use. Some of the Adiantum class of ferns are fine for this purpose. So is the branching Lycopodium. Put a pot containing either of these plants in a pretty jardiniere, or give it a cover of pale olive crepe paper, tied with a white or rose-colored or old-gold ribbon, and you have something extremely ornamental in itself. Now add to it a few flowers on stems long enough to hold them above the foliage, and you have a decoration large enough and elaborate enough for the table on special occasions. The flowers used can have their stems thrust into the soil in which the plant is growing, and this allows one to dispose of them very naturally, and keeps them fresh quite as well as water would. A Rex Begonia, with richly colored foliage; a Primula Onconica, starred all over with its pale blooms that suggest the woods of spring time to you by their delicate odor and the ethereal tints their petals show; a Chinese primrose in full blossom, either red or white, or palest rose; a sword-fern, with wide-spreading fronds of darkest green; a Roman hyacinth, with its spikes of purest white flowers, giving out a fragrance that sets you dreaming of summer and gardens; a plant of Otaheite Orange showing fruit, or an Ardisia, whose scarlet berries and thick foliage remind you of the holly of holiday-time—all these and many other plants well adapted to cultivation in the window of the living-room can be made to do duty on the table. There is great economy in decorative work of the kind under consideration in the use of growing plants, for they can be used over and over again without injury to themselves, if they are not kept from the window longer than a day at a time.

The successful packing of single geraniums and pelargoniums is not at all an easy matter. The petals fall with the slightest touch, and the only way to prevent this is to drop one drop of florist's gum into the middle of the flower, being careful that it does not touch the petal itself. Azaleas are more easily gummed, but in this case it is better to drop the gum between the calyx and corolla than into the bell of the flower. Other flowers require special protection to ensure their arriving without the slightest blemish. For instance, eucharis should have a little collar of tissue paper and wool slipped under the petals, and the flowers should lie as flat as possible. All lilies should be wrapped in plenty of cotton wool, and fitted into the ends of the box in such a way that they cannot get bent. Tissue-paper is used to put next to all flowers, so that they may not become covered with bits of wool, which are difficult to get off. No damp cotton-wool should be used, as too much moisture produces mildew; the dampness of the stems when taken out of the water will be all that is necessary to preserve freshness. Ferns and foliage of any kind may be laid first, flat at the bottom of the box, and a piece of tissue-paper should come between them and the flowers. As they are not particularly fragile, they will not be hurt in the least, and only the stems of the flowers will in any way come in contact with them. If these rules are carefully carried out, flowers will generally arrive as fresh as when just gathered.—K. M. D., in The Queen.

THE RECENT ANNOUNCEMENT of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, that all employees of the corporation over seventy years of age, or all in its service thirty years, will be retired on a pension, and that hereafter all employees in service that length of time may retire with assurances of support in declining years, marks an attitude of capital toward labor which is deserving of highest commendation. It may be argued against the plan that such a declaration will not encourage thrift, but such instances will be exceptional. Mature consideration on the part of directors and officials of the road leads to the conclusion that the adoption of the plan will bring the company and its employees into closer bonds of relationship, and establish a friendliness which will insure the acme of faithfulness in the performance of duty. Similar plans are being followed by other corporations, to the advantage of both employer and employee. It is interesting to note, in this connection, that the matter of old age pensions is being agitated in Great Britain, and the time is not far distant when a Bill will be introduced in Parliament to lighten the shadows of declining years of those who have been faithful workers and good citizens of the community.

MUCH NEWSPAPER COMMENT HAS been stirred up over the expatriation of William Waldorf Astor. For reasons best known to himself, the gentleman, for some years, has preferred England as his home, and recently relinquished all claims on this country by becoming a British subject. There is no question of the right of Mr. Astor to dispose of himself as he pleases, provided such action does not interfere with the rights of others, but his is not an inspiring patriotic example to the youth of the country, and consequently criticism of his action is adverse. So long as his motives are questioned, it is even to be wondered if he has earned the respect of those who are now his fellow-citizens.

AT A MEETING OF BISHOPS AND Elders of the African M. E. Church, held in Birmingham, Ala., last week, a plan proposed by Bishop Turner that the United States government be asked to appropriate one hundred million dollars to defray the expenses of deporting the colored people of the South "to some other country where they would be by themselves," was officially endorsed. It is hardly to be supposed that such an appropriation, a sum sufficient to build the Niagara canal, would ever be seriously considered by Congress, and it is quite improbable that the plan, even if carried out, would solve the race problem. The success of the Liberian experiment was not such as to encourage further colonization schemes. It is not surprising, in view of numerous lynchings, that negro leaders should bend their energies to devise a plan for the relief of their race, but deportation will not afford a solution.

IT IS REPORTED, ALTHOUGH NOT confirmed, that the Czar of Russia intends to call another conference of the Powers to discuss the situation in the Balkan States, and the condition of Armenian and Macedonian Christians who suffer under Turkish oppression. If the report be true, the Czar will deserve gratitude as a benefactor of mankind. Cables are in effect that the Sultan is much disturbed over the prospect of interference. The emancipation of Crete, although long delayed, was a step in the right direction, and may well be followed by united action in the direction of the Balkans. It would be a fitting act to mark the close of the century.

THE OUTBREAK OF YELLOW FEVER which occurred at the Soldiers' Home, at Hampton, Va., is being kept from assuming more serious proportions, and the number of deaths has not been sufficiently great to create general alarm. The establishment of a rigid quarantine has prevented a spread of the disease. It has been ascertained to a reasonable certainty that the infection was brought from Cuba, which removes the fear that conditions in the south are ripe for an epidemic. That more cases are not reported in the south may be due to the thorough cleaning and scrubbing which Cuba has undergone, under supervision of American military officials.

SOME DAILY PAPERS GAVE A GOOD deal of space last week to reports from Kansas and Nebraska, in effect that crops were being eaten up by grasshoppers, and this week telegraphic denials from the supposedly afflicted section of the country state that the damage will be insignificant. The truth of the matter is, that the agricultural west is in a most prosperous condition. Full crops last year were followed by a general lifting of mortgages, and this year the yield of wheat and corn promises a maximum. This prosperity is reflected in western business sections, where wholesale mercantile concerns and factories are enjoying trade such as has seldom been equalled.

THE NECESSITY IN THE STATE OF Illinois of a law which would equitably distribute the tax burden, is amply borne out by the assessment which has just been concluded. Under the new law, every property owner is required to file a sworn schedule of his personal belongings. If he fails to do so, the assessors may fix the total valuation to the best of their ability, and add to this amount fifty per cent. as penalty. The assessment is published, and if it can be shown that schedules are falsely sworn to, prosecution for perjury may follow. In numerous instances every possible obstacle has been placed in the way of the assessors, and the board of review has in many cases raised schedules which were ridiculously low. The total amount of personal valuation last year in Chicago was $21,000,000, while under the new law it is $62,000,000. It would seem that the occupation of the "tax fixer" is gone.

THE PROPAGANDA OF THE MOR-Mon Church is not being received with favor in the South. For some little time "apostles" from Salt Lake City have been actively at work in different sections seeking converts to their faith, and their proselyting has aroused an opposition which has taken the form of forcible antagonism. As there seems to be no legal way of restricting Mormon activity, emissaries of Mormonism have been advised that their health would be greatly benefited by change of scene and climate, and in some instances these warnings have been heeded. There have as yet, except in Alabama, been few cases of violence, but the temper of some Southern people being well known, discretion has been considered the better part of valor. The Governor of Alabama has promised to do all in his power to secure the arrest of mob leaders who assaulted two Mormon elders at the home of the Cunard family in Jasper county, when the lady of the house was shot.

LOUIS F. COREA, NICARAGUAN charge d'affaires, has returned to Washington from a three months' visit in his own country, with credentials as envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary, and with authority to negotiate a treaty with the United States for the construction of the isthmian canal. It is reported that a strong annexation sentiment is growing in Nicaragua, shared by officials and members of the Nicaraguan congress. It is surmised that conferences of Mr. Corea with his government have brought about a change in sentiment, for it is not long since that the proposed transfer of private canal concessions to the United States government was vigorously opposed.

THE NEW TRIAL OF CAPTAIN AL-fred Dreyfus has begun, and the world is now awaiting its outcome with interest, not because a man is on trial who has distinguished himself greatly or performed acts which have endeared him, but because of an innate love of justice, and to see the honor of the French nation rise above military and official intrigue. In the light of revelations since his former conviction, there can be little question of his innocence, but his acquittal will be a virtual indictment of those in high places who conspired to convict the man chiefly because of his race and religion. It is for this reason that energy is being bent to secure another conviction, and a feeling formented against the prisoner that acquittal will mean dishonor to the army. Exposure of corruption of a clique of officials will by no means signify dishonor of the army, and in all likelihood those working hardest for conviction are most apt to be besmirched by an acquittal. It is to be hoped justice will triumph.

The News of the Church

Henry Codman Potter, D.D., LL.D., Bishop

A new organ, costing about $4,000, is nearly completed, and will soon be placed in position in the crypt chapel of the cathedral of St. John the Divine.

At St. Chrysostom's chapel, the burial service has just been held of Mr. Gideon J. Tucker, formerly Secretary of State of this commonwealth. The Rev. Canon Knowles officiated.

St. Simeon's mission church, Melrose, borough of the Bronx, Greater New York, has so increased its congregation that it has been obliged to enlarge its present accommodations.

St. Mary's church, Beechwood, has come under the temporary charge of the Rev. S. G. S. Weills, chaplain of Sing Sing prison, during the absence of the rector, the Rev. Thomas R. Harris, D.D.

The board of trustees of St. Stephen's College, Annandale, has sold part of its land, comprising 130 acres called "Blithewood," to a member of the Church Club, Mr. Andrew C. Zabriskie, of New York, for $45,000. This will much aid the funds of the college.

At the floating church of Our Saviour, of the Seamen's Mission Society, the missionary, the Rev. Archibald R. Mansfield, has just returned from his vacation, and taken up active work again. During his absence services among the sailors were in charge of the Rev. F. J. C. Moran.

Sunday Services Omitted

At St. Mark's church, no services will be held during August. The new rector, the Rev. Loring W. Batten, Ph.D., will enter upon his duties the first Sunday in September.

In Aid of Newsboys

The Rev. James LeBaron Johnson, one of the curates of Grace church, made an address at a meeting just held at the Central Hotel, in connection with a movement intended to better the condition of the newsboys of New York, now engaged in a strike against certain newspapers.

Sermon on Christian Science

At Trinity church, Mt. Vernon, the rector, the Rev. S. T. Graham, preached a special sermon, Sunday, July 30th, taking for his subject, "Christian Science positively anti-Christian." The sermon was preached in answer to popular inquiries made by parishioners and others, regarding the real position of Christian Science.

Farewell Sermon at St. Mark's

The rector of St. Mark's church—Washington Irving memorial—North Tarrytown, the Rev. Arnold H. Redding, preached his farewell sermon, Sunday, July 30th, and also preached a farewell sermon the same day at the Worthington memorial chapel, Elmsford, of which he has been in charge for the past three years. He sailed for Europe Aug. 5th, to be gone two months.

New Mission at Ardsley

The new mission at Ardsley has made a prosperous start. A large store has been fitted up as a chapel, with a chancel, vestry room, and other furnishings, and given the name of St. Paul's chapel. The Rev. R. M. Berkeley, rector of Zion church, Dobbs Ferry, has charge of the work, and is being assisted during the summer months by Mr. Lawrenceeson, a theological student. Services have been regularly begun.

Special Addresses at St. Mary's

At St. Mary's church, Mott Haven, the Rev. Joseph Reynolds, the rector, has during his vacation placed the services in the charge of the Rev. Wm. L. Evans, who has begun a special course of addresses on Sunday school work, with the topics: "Fundamental principles of education as applied to Sunday school work";

"The Sunday school—what is it?" "The peace and work of the Sunday school in the Church's system"; "Class teaching, and how to manage a class"; "The lesson, how to prepare it and how to give it"; "Address to teachers and parents."

To Settle Labor Troubles

Bishop Potter has informed leading members of the Social Reform Club that he is now prepared to take up the task of organizing a permanent council of mediation and conciliation, with the purpose of preventing strikes by the employees of surface railways in New York city. The Bishop has long contemplated taking this important step, and for want of something of the sort, found himself in an awkward position during the recent serious troubles in the street railway strikes, which affected wide territory and large numbers of people in Greater New York. He was then requested by the strikers to arbitrate in their behalf, but felt that such effort would be almost sure of failure, on account of the attitude of the capitalists, and was on the point of communicating to the principal newspapers, with a view to creating a healthy public opinion, when the strike suddenly came to an end. The Bishop, President Seth Low, of Columbia University, and Mr. Felix Adler are the three men who have heretofore been selected by contending parties as arbitrators, and all are prominent on the present Board of Mediation and Conciliation, which was originally organized in connection with the Church Association for Advancing the Interests of Labor, and the experience of these men, and of this general board, has been that it is impracticable to offer services of arbitration during strikes, except at the request of both the parties concerned. The new council which Bishop Potter is to organize particularly for the street railway interests, is to consist of representatives of the different railway employees' unions, together with the presidents of all the railway companies. His purpose is, on the one hand, to prevent the inconvenience to the public which is always attendant upon a strike in transit service of a great city, and equally, on the other hand, to prevent suffering to strikers and their families. He also aims at bringing to knowledge such grievances on the part of employees as have a basis in justice, and to induce employers to treat these in a spirit of fairness, and thus save the loss of income entailed by the stoppage of traffic. The Bishop has arranged his organization and its methods of procedure along the lines of movements of the same character which have already achieved success in temporary efforts. The Bishop is president of the New York Council of Mediation and Conciliation, which is already in organic relation with many leading employers, professional men, and labor representatives, and has exceptional means for drawing together adverse elements of the community, for the securing of a common purpose in the public interests.

Pennsylvania

Ozi William Whitaker, D.D., LL.D., Bishop

Archdeacon and Mrs. C. T. Brady who have a cottage at Cape May this season, returned to Philadelphia on the 1st inst., and on the following day started for a three weeks' trip to Minnesota, and will thence return to the seashore.

Improvements at Zion Church, Philadelphia

Are being made at a cost of about $4,500. New pews will replace the old ones; the interior is to be frescoed; cathedral glass for the windows and electric lighting are to be introduced.

A Thoughtful, Kindly Act

A wealthy Philadelphia layman has performed an act which recalls the palmy days of Jay Cooke. This summer he instructed a confidential agent to find a certain number of the most hardworked and poorly paid clergymen in town, and supplied the means of providing for the services, while these clergymen take a rest during the month of August.

Death of Joseph Longstreth

A telegram was received in Philadelphia on the 29th ult., announcing the death the previous day, at Para, Brazil, of Joseph Longstreth, a prominent Germantown Churchman, aged 35 years. Though possessed of a strong constitution, he succumbed to yellow fever. A requiem celebration of the Holy Eucharist in his memory, was offered at St. Luke's church, Germantown, on Tuesday morning, 1st inst., which was attended by his many relatives and friends. The rector, the Rev. Dr. Samuel Upjohn, officiated.

Resignation of the Rev. O. S. Michael

The Rev. Oscar S. Michael, vicar of Epiphany chapel, Philadelphia, has tendered his resignation to the vestry of St. Luke's and Epiphany, to take effect about Sept. 1st. As his vacation began on the 1st inst., he preached his farewell discourse on Sunday, 30th ult. After the Holy Communion service, a committee, on behalf of the congregation presented Mr. Michael with a substantial gift, as a direct expression of their esteem and regard, and for the praiseworthy manner in which he had discharged his duties during his three years' service.

A Hospital's Year

In the ninth annual report of the board of managers of St. Timothy's Memorial Hospital and House of Mercy, Roxboro', Philadelphia, acknowledgment is made of the generosity of the public in subscribing $13,000 to pay off the indebtedness on the new ward. During the year, 1,535 cases were admitted, and, including those remaining from last year, 1,608 were treated. Of these, 1,467 were discharged cured, 25 improved, and 35 died. The receipts for the year, including balance of $1,124.31 from last year, were $29,216.43; present balance, $1,356.14.

A Rector's Farewell

The Rev. C. Campbell Walker, for the past seven years rector of Zion church, Philadelphia, delivered his farewell sermon on Sunday morning, 30th ult., to a crowded congregation. On Monday evening, 31st ult., the parishioners tendered him a farewell reception, and a handsome gold watch was presented to their late rector. Mr. Walker is a graduate of Oxford University, England. He received Holy Orders from the Lord Bishop of Rochester, and after laboring for some years in London, went to Australia, where he engaged in missionary work, remaining there until 1891, when he came to the United States.

Lenten Sunday School Offering of 1899

The Rev. Dr. Herman L. Duhring, of Philadelphia, who traveled extensively last winter on behalf of the Lenten offering of the Sunday schools in the United States, has just heard from New York that the amount received to July 1st, from 3,016 schools, was $35,146.50, a gain of $5,375 and 76 schools over the same date last year. During July, over $1,000 was received from 36 schools, making the total to Aug. 1st, $36,148.50 from 3,052 schools. Judging by last year, it is hoped that another thousand dollars will be received by Sept. 1st. The Lenten offering for 1899 thus becomes memorable, as being the largest amount ever raised by the children of the Church, in any Lenten season; and more schools have participated than ever before in this special systematic effort to support the domestic and foreign missionary work of the Church. The total offering comes closer than ever before to the $100,000 mark, which certainly will be reached in 1900, if this same increase continues. Of the total, $36,148.50, the single diocese of Pennsylvania contributed $15,917.11—as was printed in THE LIVING CHURCH of May 13th—or nearly 18½ per cent.

Dallas

Alexander Chas. Garrett, D.D., LL.D., Bishop
Consecration of St. Paul's

The edifice of St. Paul's mission, Greenville, was consecrated on Sunday, July 30th, by Bishop Garrett, assisted by the priest in-charge, the Rev. J. Orson Miller. The Bishop preached the sermon, and administered the rite of Confirmation to five persons. This is the second presentation this year, and the third visitation on the part of the Bishop. The mission is at present enjoying a very satisfactory and permanent growth, and a bright future seems to await the Church in this place. The priest-in-charge, who is stationed at McKinney, conducts divine service here the second and fifth Sundays of every month, and is often present to take charge of the Wednesday evening service. A very enthusiastic and competent lay-reader reads Morning Prayer every Sunday, and it is to his efforts and those of his wife that much credit is and should be given. The Sunday school is under the care of an efficient superintendent. The church, which is a beautiful frame building, neatly and completely furnished, was erected some three years ago. The people now contemplate the erection of a suitable rectory, with the view of calling a permanent rector in the near future. The ladies' guild, which is a faithful and earnest body, promises $200 a year towards his stipend. Greenville is a railroad centre, and many people here looking for "the Church" will find the same in St. Paul's mission.

Ohio

Wm. Andrew Leonard, D.D., Bishop
Retirement of Rev. Thos. Lyle

The Rev. Thos. Lyle, on account of impaired health and advancing age, resigned the charge of the church of the Holy Spirit, Cleveland, on June 1st. He was elected by the vestry rector emeritus of the parish, and the Rev. Dr. A. C. Jones, of Wellsville, was chosen to fill the vacant rectorship. Mr. Lyle's ministry in Cleveland reaches back over 30 years of faithful service at St. Paul's, East Cleveland, at the church of the Good Shepherd, and, latterly, at the church of the Holy Spirit. He has been in the ministry of the Church between 40 and 50 years, and is beloved and honored by all who know him.

Work of the Rev. W. T. Smith

The Rev. Wemyss T. Smith has resigned the charge of the church of the Good Shepherd, the resignation to take effect Sept. 1st, after which he will have a month's vacation. He has received a call to St. John's church, Ft. Smith, Ark. Mr. Smith has also had charge of the church of the Incarnation, Glenville, a mission which has grown and strengthened so much under his care that it now expects to become a separate parish and have a rector of its own.

Springfield

Geo. F. Seymour, S.T.D., LL.D., Bishop
Chas. R. Hale, D.D., Bishop-coadjutor

The Bishop of Springfield has addressed the following letter to the clergy and laity of his diocese:

SPRINGFIELD, ILLS.
BISHOP'S HOUSE, Aug 7, 1899.

DEAR BROTHER:

It is with sincere sorrow for ourselves, and sympathy for him, that I communicate to you the information, that owing to impaired health our beloved coadjutor, acting under medical advice, has gone for a year's rest to Europe.

There is a serious trouble with the heart, which is a menace to his precious life. May I ask you, dear brethren, to remember our brother bishop in your prayers in private, and from time to time, as you may deem fitting, request your flocks to join you in intercession to God on his behalf, in the public services of the Church.

In view of the fact that the care of the whole diocese will revert to me during the coming year, from the present month until October, 1900, may I ask you to help me, as far as you can, in the discharge of my added duties?

This assistance you can most effectually give me by fixing upon the time, within, say, the limits of a month, when you desire a visitation, and communicating your wishes to me at as early a date as practicable.

The doing this will enable me to arrange and systematize my work, so that I can do the most with the least expenditure of time and travel.

I beg to assure my brethren, clerical and lay, in the southern half of the diocese, that my increased labors will receive more than a compensation in the pleasure which it will afford me to meet them again in their homes and the Church. The shadow of our sorrow for Bishop Hale's enforced absence will be more than counterbalanced by the hope of his speedy return to us, permanently restored in health of body and vigor of mind.

Commending you to the grace of God, I remain, with sincere affection, faithfully yours,

GEORGE F. SEYMOUR,
Bishop of Springfield.

A Growing Parish

The parish of the Holy Cross, Dundas, is an example of what may be done in a small town by a faithful and wise clergyman. In a few years the congregations have greatly increased, the communicant roll has quadrupled in number, and the best country choir known to the writer has been built up. On Sunday last, the feast of the Transfiguration, there were two notable musical services, with the aid of a little imported help, the local choir of boys and girls and a few women rendered the services as correctly, as nobly, and as impressively as one could wish to hear. In the evening the service was full choral, nothing was lacking except men's voices, and yet, notwithstanding this lack, the volume and fullness of sound were greater than one would have imagined. The drill had been perfect, and the singing was all that could be desired. The church, a beautiful gothic structure in stone, is small, the chancel small even in proportion to the size of the church. The choir floor has been extended well out into the nave, so as to accommodate the large vested choir. The rector, the Rev. Edward Moyses, finds the vestry room too small, and feels that a choir room is a necessity. He already has some money for this purpose, and hopes to raise funds sufficient to bear the expense of alterations.

Southern Florida

Wm. Crane Gray, D.D., Bishop

Bishop W. C. Gray and the Rev. Henry W. Little, missionary of Volusia, made a brief trip through the district, on July 21st and 22d. Confirmations were held at Orange City and New Smyrna, and the hearty addresses delivered, and practical sympathy shown by the Bishop for the work of the Church in these new centres, were much appreciated. The Bishop was the guest of the missionary and Mrs. Little at the new parsonage, in De Land, where the parish of St. Barnabas has just completed the purchase of this valuable property as a residence for their clergyman and his family. The Bishop confirmed a large class at Holy Cross, Sanford, on Sunday, the 24th.

A New Church in Sparta

Twenty years ago a lot was purchased, with the expectation of building a church, the lack of which has caused Church work in Sparta to be very feeble. A new edifice for the parish of the Ascension is now in course of construction. A new church has just been erected at Eatonton, and has been called All Angels, in consideration of the fact that it was greatly aided in its erection by the Sunday school of All Angels' church, New York city.

Mission Organized at Crowley

The Rev. Mr. Boberg, lately admitted into the diaconate, has organized a mission at Crowley, under the name of Trinity. Mr. P. S. Pugh has taken charge of the Sunday school, while the Rev. Mr. Slack administers the Holy Communion when practicable. It is reported a building site has been secured for a church while several hundred dollars are in bank with which to begin to build.

Church of the Good Shepherd, Lake Charles

This is vacant, through the removal of the Rev. J. H. Spearing to Shreveport. The Rev. Mr. Boberg, a deacon, has temporary charge and is holding the life of the parish well together until a priest shall be secured.

Church Training and Deaconess House

OF THE DIOCESE OF PENNSYLVANIA

It would be difficult to find a more desirable location for this work than this large, old-fashioned house at 708 Spruce st. Bordering on the worst quarter of the city, it is yet in a good neighborhood, near the depots and the Church House; and gives easy access to the mission work in the factory district of Kensington, and among the foreign population nearer the school. Three days in the week are spent by the students in this district work, under careful personal supervision. Three days more are given to study under the direction of an experienced faculty. One day in seven the student has at her own disposal.

The service held in the school chapel, on the last Wednesday in May, marked the close of a happy and prosperous year. The school, which accommodates 20 boarders, had been full. After their final term of ten weeks in the hospital, a class of eight hope to graduate in October, and of these, three expect to become deaconesses at once. In his farewell address, the Bishop alluded to the fact that several of their number would have gone to the mission field before the pupils reassembled in October. Two of these, Miss Neely and Miss Wall, go to Japan in September with the largest party of missionaries ever sent to that field.

A new venture of the past year has been the establishment of a department in practical sociology, under the supervision of Miss Helen Parrish. This promises to become an important branch of the work in connection with the practical training.

The next year will open Oct. 4th. The preceding Tuesday will be kept as a Quiet Day in the school, with addresses in the chapel, intended for those graduating, especially those about to enter the deaconess order; those who have already been engaged in this work, and those preparing for it by taking the prescribed training. The object is to deepen the spirit of self-consecration. For while only women of mature self-knowledge and a clear vocation are encouraged to enter the deaconess order without longer probation, it is hoped that all who are trained here for the Master's work may realize more and more the blessedness of self-devotion.

IS it true? Is it true that "Jesus is an exploded force in history?" So a German critic asserted. So the deceased Ingersoll was wont to teach. But the Name that is above every name will not down at the beck and nod of these too willing foes. There is an inherent vitality in that Name which has survived more menacing attacks than any now made by unbelievers. Have we forgotten the history of the early centuries, or the days of humanism and the renaissance? Must we be reminded of the Encyclopedists and the god-dess of reason? "I am tired," said Voltaire, "of hearing that it took only twelve men to set up Christianity in the world. I will show that it needs only one man to destroy it." But when that one man's last hour came it was a priest of Christ's church whom he sent for to give his parting soul a blessing. The religion of the ages will survive the assaults of the present age, and be a perennial source of comfort to the sorrowing, pardon to the penitent, and hope to the dying.

WE are to be favored with another lecture tour by some unheard of dignitary of the Church, who, in obedience to the coaching of a shrewd manager, is to follow in the succession of which Dr. Farrar was a pioneer example. The object is to gather in a crop of Yankee shekels, and no doubt the object will be gained, for the Yankee fools are not all dead yet. If our language seem severe, we but echo the opinion of the best men on both sides of the water who deprecate this growing form of affliction, as a covetous method of taking advantage of our American hurry to run after any well advertised name, and as a serious surrender of that reserve and dignity which ought to hedge the representative clergy of the Church. There are thousands of our English friends who feel as Lord Macaulay did when he wrote (in 1849) that he could not visit the United States because of our tendency to lionize foreigners, a thing which, he added, "must cause annoyance to sensitive and fastidious men." We wish the delicate sense of propriety which this indicates might infect all the men of the present generation, and free us from what has been considered little less than a scandalous stooping to secure pecuniary results.

IT has been suggested that it would be politic should the Church press remain silent in regard to the crisis which is upon us, on the ground that Holy Scripture is not in any real danger. We admit the premise, but we deny the conclusion. The word of the Lord standeth fast, and the Bible is stronger than its destructive critics. It is in no danger; but the faith of many is. The ruthlessly free handling of the Inspired Word of God by these self-crowned dictators who announce that black is "probably" white, and that there is very grave doubt whether yellow and blue ever made green, has resulted in much quiet skepticism among many of our youth of both sexes. They do not advertise their misgivings, perhaps are not altogether conscious of their state of mind, but they stay away from church and talk about the new things—new thought, new age, new woman, new everything; and if they lose faith altogether, as many have, their blood will be upon these "scholars" and these "broad" pulpiteers who have writ a new Bible with an interrogation point after every other verse, and publish polychrome editions with all the colors of the rainbow on every page to show that as many "various hands" had to do with its authorship.

SOME of the newspapers in describing the funeral exercises over Col. Ingersoll, have enlarged upon the exhibition of hopeless grief on the part of the bereaved family. One observer declared that the sight was enough to make the coldest heart feel the inestimable value of the Christian's hope. The sorrow of the followers of Christ may be deep and strong, but it is brightened by the confident belief that those who have passed away are in the hands of God, and rest in the hope of a joyful resurrection. This confidence in the face of death was one of the distinguishing marks of Christianity. Light sprang up for those who sat in the valley and shadow of death. Those who through a pagan training meet death without this hope, and suffer the agony of an eternal parting, deserve our heartfelt commiseration, but we may not judge them with severity. Practical paganism too often reveals itself in the bosom of a nominally Christian society. If the fruits of agnosticism are seen in the despair of the mourner, what shall we say of the scenes sometimes witnessed at ostensibly Christian funerals? Are they not calculated to suggest to the spectator that the Christian faith is a failure and the Resurrection a myth? The injury done to the cause of Christ by faithless disciples is incalculably greater than any result of open antagonism.

IN a time like this the faith of young people is at best a delicate flower. All the innate materialism of newly attained manhood and womanhood rises in revolt against the predominance of the spirit over the flesh. This is the period when questionings break out like the measles, and cover the mind with a rash of skepticism. Perhaps your son or daughter has been "sitting under" some orator of the narrow school called "broad," and has been informed that he only can be saved who reads the Higher Critics, and thinks his own thoughts, and makes his own creed and canon, independently altogether of those now moribund worshipers of effete thoughts crystallized into dogmatic terms called the ancient creeds. Do you think there is no danger to your children that they will make shipwreck of their faith? And are they to be deprecated who warn you of the danger? All that there is in your life that makes it worth living you got in an age when the Bible was treated as a storehouse of wise counsels, definite doctrines, and priceless promises. As such you love it. As such you should defend it and its defenders in the great struggle upon which the Church is now launched,—the chief issue of which is not—"Shall the Bible pass?" but "Shall we suffer our youth to fall under the influence of these false teachers who try to make men believe that the Church has for nearly 2,000 years been mistaken about it?"

OFFICIAL organs, though not generally sources of revenue to the dioceses for which they are published, are helpful in many ways, and perhaps are worth all that they cost; we doubt, however, if the organ of one diocese may be legitimately used to attack and ridicule the bishop of another diocese. Even the courteous criticism of a bishop's official acts by the diocesan paper of another bishop would scarcely be counted in good taste. The Diocese of Louisiana recently contained a deplorable article signed "H. R. C.," on the Bishop of Springfield and his protest against the consecration of Dr. Funston. The writer seems to have no respect for age or office, or for a life of consecrated and brilliant service in the Church, as he scornfully remarks, "We cannot imagine any postulant for Holy Orders to be so silly." It pains him, he says, that this "ponderous soul" should see things in such a light, and write "so foolishly and inanely"; and he alludes to other "ill-tempered and ill-timed philippics" of this venerable prelate, "but none so foolish as this." He is much rejoiced that the bishops in the great centres of the country are not like Bishop Seymour, and proceeds to name several whom he greatly prefers. "A man whose vision of the Church of God is no larger than the removal of some imagined technicality," he says, "whose Catholicity is some easy and smooth recital of phrases, who identifies sound Churchmanship with postures, or acolytes, or tallows, has small claim to our respect." He hopes the Bishop of Springfield "does not err in all these particulars" (then why write such nonsense), but "he is the type of a mind (!) which misrepresents the Church." We are sorry for the Bishop and diocese of Louisiana, that such a "type of a mind" should have access to their diocesan paper. "To what base uses may we return, Horatio!"

Present Aspects of the Anglican "Crisis"

IT is interesting to review the history of the rise and progress of the agitation in the Church of England, and to observe how inevitably the controversy has reverted to first principles. The movement began with an attack upon certain "additional services" and ornamental adjuncts of the Prayer Book offices. But soon it fastened itself upon more important matters, especially these three: The practice of private confession, the ceremonial use of incense, and the reservation of the Sacrament of the Holy Communion for the sick. The discussion could not proceed far without reopening the whole question of the tribunals, by which questions of doctrine, discipline, and worship are to be finally settled in the Anglican Church. Here is the rock upon which men split. The whole question of the relation between Church and State is involved. One side holds that the ultimate tribunal, or court of appeal, must be a creation of the State. They uphold the present tribunal, which was given this jurisdiction by a pure blunder some sixty years ago. It is a committee of the Privy Council, and may embrace men who are members of the Church by Baptism simply, but not in sympathy or conviction. It may even contain active members of other denominations. Even apart from these glaring anomalies, it is in no sense an ecclesiastical court. It is amazing to find men who have at heart the true interests of Christ's religion, earnestly and honestly contending that such a board is a proper tribunal for the final settlement of matters connected with faith and worship.

THE other party absolutely refuses to accept the jurisdiction of such a court. It rests upon the ancient principle that the sphere of Caesar is one thing and that of God is another. During the last thirty years, more than one of the English clergy have gone to prison rather than admit the jurisdiction of secular courts in spiritual affairs. There is no doubt that the same thing will happen again and again, if the attempt is made to set that kind of machinery in motion. The case stands thus: All agree that there must be courts, that discipline is impossible without them. But the question, so far unsettled, is: "What courts?" The Archbishops have made an endeavor to meet that question. A very memorable conference has been held, in the shape of a joint meeting of the two convocations of Canterbury and York, at which the propositions of the Archbishops were submitted for consideration. They were in the form of resolutions which, if assented to by the majority, might ultimately be presented to Parliament to obtain legal sanction. But these propositions aim to give a new sanction to the Privy Council as the Court of Appeal in ecclesiastical causes. The attempt is made to do away with some objectionable features. The members of the Privy Council qualified to sit in this court must be "members of the Church of England," and, under certain circumstances, the Archbishops and bishops must be consulted. But there is no definition of what is to constitute a councillor a member of the Church of England, nor is the Court in any way bound by the opinion of the bishops after it has been sought. And, at the best, the Court of Appeals thus constituted would be a secular, and not an ecclesiastical, body.

IT is no matter of surprise that, after two days' discussion, this memorable meeting of the two great legislative bodies of the Church failed to adopt the proposals of the Archbishops, and the whole matter was laid over for further consideration in the two convocations. There is little doubt that the High Church party will resist to the bitter end any attempt to give formal ecclesiastical sanction to the present Court of Appeals. It is with them a matter of life and death. Ordinarily, where such a crucial principle is felt to be at stake by a large and powerful party, the victory, though delayed, would not be doubtful; but in England the probabilities are in favor of some kind of temporary working settlement, or modus vivendi, which shall leave the fundamental principle still undecided. Such a method, unsatisfactory as it is from an abstract point of view, has the advantage of giving time for the development and spread of the truth. Nothing is settled prematurely by the mere fiat of authority, leaving the losing party unconvinced, and endangering unity. The conflict which is going on before our eyes in modern forms is in its essence a very old one. The same questions were involved in the controversy about "investiture," which for so long a time agitated Europe in the middle ages, and more precisely in the warfare in England over the jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical courts. Then the charge was that the Church was usurping the functions of the State, and bringing into her courts what were really secular causes. Now the wheel has turned full circle, and it is the State which intrudes upon the ecclesiastical jurisdiction.

The Royalty of Service

BY THE RT. REV. HUGH MILLER THOMPSON

WITH the man Christ Jesus came the proclamation of the higher and eternal law; above all the so-called laws of "political economy," the law of the kingdom of God—that all things are worth just their uses to others, worth no more; that all the universe is girdled by that golden law which binds cherubim and seraphim, principalities and powers, as it binds suns and stars, dewdrops and grass-blades—the law of use, the law of service—that the universe is held together by that law, in harmony; that nothing lives to itself nor dies to itself—least of all man made in the image of God; that no place exists for itself, no strength, no dignity, no honor, for the enjoyment of any possessor; that the highest place is the place of highest toil and care and profoundest suffering; that the contrary imagination is diabolic—belongs to the heathen and the blind; that he that is greatest in the kingdom of God is the slave of all; that the Son of Man comes not to be served, but to serve; and this is the new law and the old law—the eternal law which is to be received as the basic law of the kingdom of God upon the earth, as it is the law of the kingdom of God in heaven.

So the lowest service, to outward sight the most menial and debasing, "done all for love and nothing for reward," becomes a divine service noble and kingly.

Slowly as the years have passed have men grown to see the law revealed. Yet the growth has been sure, if slow. All our hospitals for the sick, our asylums for the blind or the deaf, our orphan asylums, our refuges for the destitute, the manifold charities of Christian lands, stand to contradict every axiom of political economy, to laugh at every conclusion of the philosophy of "survival of the fittest" and "natural selection," and to reveal the fact that the laws of the Kingdom of Heaven are working among men.

So, too, the change in political order from the kings of the great dead empires, who governed according to their own fancies, used their high estates to gratify their own lusts, and are gone, never to return. The law of the kingdom may be broken, may be outraged, but it is never denied, and we remorselessly drag every leader, lord and king of men, whatever name we give him, to the bar of the inexorable law, and demand the lowliest service from the highest place, the heaviest load of care and toil from the loftiest honor, and stand upon the revelation made on Calvary, that the only real human crown for all men's love and loyalty, is a crown of thorns.

In the lapse of years Christ's words and deeds have grown to power in the lives of the generations. We are more clearly seeing how the human answers to the Divine; how the temporal as we call it, lies in the encircling arms of the Eternal; how there is but one law, in all the æons, for men and angels, for earth and heaven.

The greatest is he who does the greatest service. The kingliest soul must stoop the lowest and do the lowliest service. It was a sort of parable that foolish as one may think it, the loathsome disease could be cured only by a royal hand. The King "touched" for the King's evil!

The world's crowned sovereigns in the days fast coming are not "war lords," but peace lords; not leaders and organizers of men armed for ambition or hatred, but of men poor and lost and struggling, to lead and lift them to light, to comfort, and to peace. The old, diabolic kingship, for its own glory, has fled to the pit whence it came, to curse the earth no more. And the new kingship divine, that washes the wounded and weary feet of the century-worn pilgrim, humanity, faint and sore-bested, as it struggles toward the dawn, this kingship of the Kingdom of Heaven is coming to deliver.

For the Divine King showed us the lesson plain, drew the veil from the golden law, declared that earth must stand as Heaven stands, men must stand as angels and God stand, and earthly kingship answer to the awful Kingship above the white heavens. Service is royalty.

The highest royalty takes the lowliest service. God stoops to cure the leper, to serve the lame, to wash the feet of men. And so men lift themselves by God's grace to royalties in the Kingdom of Heaven, and the earth into the light of its redemption, by gladly recognizing the Law whose "seat is the bosom of God." Lovingly living by its royal demands, they climb to the thrones and the crowns which pass not away.

And still the Church of God stands for the type and norm of the kingdom of God. Her law is brotherhood, or she has no law at all. Her work is service, or she has no work and no reason to be. She is worth just the service she does and no more. A diocese is worth the good it does. A parish is worth the service it fulfils. A deacon, priest, or bishop is worth only what lowliest service he does for the souls and bodies of those for whom Christ died.

In such service only does Church or ministry find the character for its claims. There is no dignity and no authority that is not buttressed by the service rendered. I think we are all seeing this. I am glad to believe I am not uttering anything new to you in these thoughts, drawn from the wonderful episode of that wonderful night. I am only hoping to bring them out somewhat clearer, to emphasize the common conviction of a living Church more plainly.

And let me emphasize once more the fact that the service was a menial and degrading service, a slave's service. To outward eye that only. But done for love! See how that lifts it! Done by mother to child, by son to father, by daughter to mother, by dear friend to dear friend, fallen and weary, and the service becomes noble and beautiful!

It was done among the chosen, remember that; done as an example of apostolic duty and ministerial obligation; done as a revelation of the humility and dignity of the Apostleship, "I have given you an example that ye should do as I have done to you!"

The ministry of the Church of God is the servant of all. It holds its dignity under that law. There is no service too humble, no place of help too lowly, no care too small, and all are royal and divine, if so be that love leads. For all these poor brethren the Lord lived and died, and ever intercedes before the throne. For these He sent His Church, commissioned His Apostles to the end of time, and put the law of humility as the law supreme.

"My Brother's Keeper"

FROM A "PRISON SERMON," BY THE REV. WILLIAM GARDAM.

WE must believe that the world's life is working towards and up to this generalization of the unity, the oneness of man in his rights, privileges, and moral status before God; that gradually this higher classification is supplanting the old classifications in which man himself has sought to establish primary differences—to make one man a child of the stars and another a child of hell; to enable one man to go into the house of God and thus to place himself in the order of God's kingdom, "God, I thank Thee I am not as other men are," and to compel another to believe in election to an evil life and to damnation from the eternities. We must believe that the centuries have been an upward struggle, not a downward, and that the moral order of the higher life, the higher civilization, the higher righteousness has been the fruit of the centuries of struggle and conflict.

After all, the brotherhood and unity of man are not a discovery, an evolution from a purely human start-point. I think as you study history you will find that this movement towards unity, this growth in mankind of the sense of the identity of human rights and privileges, the oneness of opportunity before God, is distinctly the creation of that great principle with which the Church of Jesus Christ began her mission among the forces and conditions of human history—the principle that identifies the thief on the cross with the Apostle Paul in a common inheritance, and which places the same stamp of immortality upon the loving devotion of the Magdalen as upon the greatest saint of the ages.

My brethren, I am not a specialist upon the subject I have elected to speak upon tonight. I am simply a preacher of the gospel of hope and light and righteousness, and I do believe there is no salvation for you or me, no safety for any of us, save as we recognize that the power to do and to be, all reformatory grace and gifts, are from above, and not of ourselves; that the redemption of this world, the creation of ideal conditions among men in all the interests of life, economic and social as well as religious, so that nobody shall go hungry or naked, nobody shall defraud or do violence to his neighbor, nobody shall convert life into a battle ground of selfish interests,—must come of seeing the divinity in us and the divinity in all life, so that in Him we live and move and have our being.

It is one of the crowns, I think of our day, that the best authorities among those who are spending their lives in regenerative and reformatory work for the State, insist with a clearness and emphasis and a divine sense of responsibility upon St. Paul's own humanitarian principle, that those "who are strong ought to bear the infirmities of the weak, and so fulfill the law of Christ"; that weakness, defectiveness, the violence of wrongdoing, are simply arguments for the exercise of the reparative forces, all the helpful forces our modern civilization can command; that crime does not excommunicate the criminal from the brotherhood, but that all the healthy resources of the entire body should be employed for the recovery and restoration of such an one.

It is the greatest and most vital test of the character of the world's civilization,—the attitude of the lawabiding to the lawbreak-

ing, of the strong to the weak, of the morally sound and whole to the unsound and defective. A century ago, when Howard began his great work of stirring the conscience of the world, and revealing the barbarism and inhumanity of the Christian nations in their treatment of the defective and unfortunate, this test condemned the world as most strangely unchristian. The theory then was that the duty of the State was to punish the criminal, to get even with him, to excommunicate him from the common brotherhood. The prisons and dungeons of Europe were crowded with men and women, living amid the most horrible and unspeakable conditions of filth and want and degradation,—from whose lives all hope and light had fled. A century ago it was a crime to be in debt; men and women were hauled to prison for the most trivial offences. The death penalty was inflicted for crimes that now are rather evidences of weakness, and are calls for sympathy. The end of the law was punishment; "an eye for an eye" was the motto of the State in dealing with offenders. The Christian idea of reformation did not seem to touch the criminal jurisprudence of last century. Now all seems changed. Reformation, recovery, restoration, are the prevailing watchwords of all who have to do with the delinquent and defective and criminal. The President of Corrections and Charities, in his annual address at Toronto last year, thus utters himself:

"We must regard them not as foes marching to war with us, but as our weaker brothers and sisters. . . . They have fallen behind in the race, and now lift up lame hands and blind eyes to us for help. The science that guides our work of charity and correction is asthenontology, the science of human weakness. Not an army of foes, but a great multitude of weak ones who are given into our care that we may succour and bless. 'We, then, that are strong ought to bear the infirmities of the weak.'"

The great achievement of these later days of this closing century is the discovery, or the re-discovery, of the relation of the weak to the strong, the re-defining of social relations, and the full sunlight of the highest Christian teaching let in on the question, "Am I my brother's keeper?"

The world has been Christianized on these lines, and has been bidden: "Feed the hungry, clothe the naked, visit the sick and those in prison," and the great motive has been flung across the heavens—the only motive for philanthropy—"inasmuch as ye did it to one of the least of these my brethren, ye did it unto Me."

Letters to the Editor

AN ERROR OF IGNORANCE

To the Editor of The Living Church:

The enclosed slip is cut from page 419 of the August number of The Spirit of Missions:

The missionary organ of the diocese of Southern Virginia, in its June issue, contains the following interesting statements:

Few Americans are aware of what an immense establishment the Church of England is. Its recent year book shows 1,388,386 appropriated sittings, and 4,793,008 free sittings. Its Sunday school attendance is 2,410,201, and 4,329 of its churches are opened for daily prayer. While it is supported by the State, yet its free will offerings last year were $37,531,770. Its record for ten years shows that it is not declining but is advancing along all lines.

What do you say to the statement which is underlined? E. R. COGSWELL.

Cambridge, Mass., Aug. 4th.

[All that need be said is that it is a misstatement, embodying a common error, devoutly believed by perhaps nine-tenths of our people, but an error which a diocesan organ ought not to encourage. The Church of England was not founded by Henry the Eighth, nor is it supported by the State.—Ed.]

"CHURCH MUSIC AND CHOIRS"—ANOTHER WAY

To the Editor of The Living Church:

"Once upon a time," the writer of this was called to the rectorship of a parish in a large city. Through removals from the neighborhood to the "West End," the Sunday congregations were greatly diminished. To counteract this, and bring in new material, a fine quartette choir had been organized at a large expense. They had a good organ, a flashy organist, the superb soprano voice of a Jewish maiden who did "not believe one half that she sung," the sweet alto of a Methodist lady, and the unsurpassed tenor and bass from the theatre. They "rendered" most "attractive music," but it didn't pay. A good many came to hear, but when the wardens started for the offering basons, they slipped out. At length, after nearly a year of this certainly "lovely music," the vestrymen, a noble body of Christian gentlemen, at a regular meeting of the vestry, asked the new rector if he knew anything about Church music. If so, they would like to have a change. They were tired of standing on one foot, and then on the other, to hear the singers show themselves off in solos, duets, and trios, involved, repeated, and involuted, until the whole congregation was "confounded." The result was, the resignation of the organist in a pet, followed by each of the choir. Then a Churchly organist was obtained, who gathered a number of men and boys with good voices, trained them carefully, and in addition, on one evening every week, trained the whole congregation, together with the choir, to sing together very impressively, simple, beautiful, congregational music for the chants and hymns. For example, the evening hymn, "Abide with me," was sung by the whole congregation, on their knees, in a way that brought tears to many eyes. But this was a rare instance of such worship in this land. Of course, not long, and strangers came, and stayed. And within six months there was not a pew, nor a single seat, that had not its permanent holder. And the shekels came, too, and largely. "Attractive music!" What the great body of Christ's people want, and have a right to, and nobody has the right before God to prevent them,—is to sing the praises of God in the congregation, and to sing them "in a tongue understood of the people." (Article XXIV.) We want the people attracted to the Church. Then let's go for them, as the apostles went from house to house, not to the rich and cultivated only, but to the poor, to whom the Kingdom belongs. Go, sit down by them, explain the loving Gospel, teach them the use of the Prayer Book,—bring them with you to their Father's house, and let them unite with the grand praises of the communion of Saints. There are thousands and thousands in our large cities and towns who would gladly come to our services, if any body, cleric or lay, would only treat them as Philip did the Ethiopian (Acts viii: 35). As to the "attractive music," hear a few words from Bishop Huntington:

"I sometimes hear an offertory anthem, constructed on a certain musical plan more or less florid, occupying twice as much time as the office needs, which adds nothing at all to devotional impression, conveys not a single idea, lifts no soul to God, moves nobody to charity, confirms nobody's faith. Except in intention it is entirely irreligious. Standing weary through such a trial, I have found myself straining my sense half the time, and yet in vain, to find out what words the choir was singing, and the other half wrestling with my spirit to let patience accomplish there her perfect work. We hear a good deal said reproachfully of going to church to 'hear preaching.' St. Paul who had some respect for preaching, would tell us that it is certainly no worse than to go there to hear singing. Too much of the forum, the stage, the laboratory, and the magazine, some sermons are.

What the singing may be of, is told in the advertisements of Saturday and Sunday newspapers, the printed programmes of city churches, and the flippant comments of handsomely dressed hypocrites to whom the sanctuary is a play house, sermons are a tolerated propriety, and sacraments a make believe." THE GREAT NEED OF A PRIEST AT CAPE MOUNT, WEST AFRICA

The request has twice been made that I should write some strong words regarding the need of a priest at Cape Mount. No inspiration, however, seemed to come, and I was tempted to say that no stronger appeal could be made than had already been sent out, first by Mrs. Brierley in her last letter, written not long before she left her dearly loved work. Her thought, no doubt, was then chiefly for those to whom she had so long given her life; but even for herself, we cannot help regretting that, though upheld by strong faith and certain hope, she was deprived in her last hours of the ministrations of a priest, which would have cheered her before she went to her rest. Other workers now in the mission have written also with much earnestness on this subject. Looking at it as one absent for a time from the field, the need seems, perhaps, more apparent than when actively engaged.

The mind naturally turns to those left behind, and pictures them in all the well-known trials and difficulties, and the thought will come: "Why is it that no one offers to go to fill the most important place in the mission, to be a head and guide and chief authority in all difficult matters, promoting unity among the workers and extending the work in many directions, as only one appointed for this special work can do effectively?" The work at Cape Mount has much of interest and brightness, and though there are times of illness and discouragement, are they not found in all lives of those who are devoted to duty in any sphere?

All along the African coast, north of Liberia, are to be seen convent schools of the Roman Catholic Church, where many children are taught and trained by priests and Sisters. There are also white men of different nationalities engaged in various kinds of work, officers for native troops, merchants, explorers, and traders. In much more unhealthy places than Cape Mount, these people work and risk their lives for earthly gain. How is it that here no white man is found to do the work which has the greatest recompense?

Is there no inspiration in the lives of such men as Bishop Payne and Bishop Hannington, not to mention others who have given up everything for Africa, and have been willing to die, though young in years, without regret, counting it no sacrifice, if by their deaths any should be saved? I have stood by the graves of the brave Bishop Auer and the devoted Mr. Hoffman and his lovely wife, in the quiet little cemetery near the chapel at Mt. Vaughan, and the memory of their ardent devotion and triumphant faith made the spot most sacred; and it seems to me that no one can be endowed with too great talents, or too great zeal, for this work, and that the call to it must still be, as it has always been, the last command of the ascending Saviour.

THE church at New Richmond Wis., (St. Thomas' church) was totally destroyed in the tornado which nearly wiped out that town, on June 12th. Nothing whatever remains, excepting a hole in the ground, and a mass of wreckage about it. Altar, vestments, seats, and everything, hopelessly gone. Nor was there any tornado insurance. We ask for help to rebuild, and begin our work anew. Money can be sent to the missionary-in-charge, the Rev. W. A. HOWARD, JR., Star Prairie, Wis. (P. O.), or to the BISHOP OF MILWAUKEE, Milwaukee, Wis., who has been on the ground, has seen the awful destruction, and who will guarantee this appeal.

THE third annual Retreat for priests and seminarians will be held in St. Peter's church, Westchester, New York city, beginning Monday evening, Sept. 18, 1899, with Evensong at 7:30, and concluding with a celebration of the Holy Eucharist at 7 A. M., Friday, Sept. 22d. The expense for board and lodging for the period of the Retreat will be $5. The conductor will be the Rev. J. O. S. Huntington, Superior O. H. C. BISHOP NICHOLSON, at the last meeting of the Board of Trustees of Nashotah, stated that every year, beginning with 1841, some one had sent to Nashotah the sum of $25, with only the words, "In quietness and confidence." For fifty-seven years the gift had not failed. A letter was last year received by the Bishop, from New York, stating that the mother of the writer had recently died, and upon her table was found an envelope containing a contribution for Nashotah, with the words, "In quietness and confidence." Even the members of her own family had not known of her remembrance of Nashotah.

THE teachers of Los Angeles, recalling the days of their own tenderfootness, entertained the delegates to the National Educational Association Convention (N. E. A., for short) in a way that must have been as delightful as it was novel. They bought, on the trees, the crop of a ten-acre orange ranch, transported thither their guests, and—Ladies and gentlemen, help yourselves! Then did those favored pedagogues—and goguesses—learn the true inwardness of a navel orange in mid-summer, fresh from the tree and plucked by their own hands!

BISHOP PARET, in his convention address, emphasizing the importance of giving the sacrament of Holy Baptism its rightful place in the public services of the Church, says:

Some time ago, when collections in church were generally made without any reverence or solemnity, somebody wrote about a "lost act of worship." But when the Baptism of infants is robbed of the public solemnity which the Church commands for it, and thrust aside into secrecy, surely here is a "lost act of worship." I call upon you all, clergy and people, not so to dishonor our Lord's command and appointment of blessing. Bring the fonts out in the churches where the people can see them; see that they are worthy for their holy use, and kept in order, and then see that they are used just as the Church commands.

MARKHAM'S "Man with the Hoe" shows an utter lack of appreciation of the softer, more cultured side of peasant life. He voices the pagan spirit of the day, which imagines that all labor is degrading, and every laborer can be only a "thing that grieves not, and that never hopes, stolid and stunned, a brother to the ox." He thinks that refinement, intelligence, and all delicacy of sentiment, can only exist with the accompaniment of the laundered shirt and creased trousers. But how far from the truth is all this farrago of nonsense! The Catholic World Magazine for August says:

The peasant is oftener than not the very backbone of a nation's strength, and when great and lofty sentiments have stirred the nation's heart, the agricultural population have been the first to feel their promptings, and have been the last to relinquish the struggle for their attainment. Great movements for civil and religious freedom, the struggle for a people's rights, as well as for a country's liberties, have begun oftener than not with the country folks, because their heart is close to the great heart of nature, and is attuned to noble and lofty sentiments. When there is added to this rectitude of heart an abiding sense of religion, the peasant becomes the most perfected type of an enduring civilization.

BISHOP THOMPSON, in his annual address, said: "I pass beyond our own boundaries to the larger Church of which we are a part. The events since last we met have increased our responsibilities as a people and as a Church. Mission fields have opened to us in Cuba, Puerto Rico, Hawaii, and the Philippines, which we dare not leave unoccupied. Doors are opened, and we are called to enter with Anglo-Saxon civilization and Anglo-Saxon Christianity. The nation may be afraid of its own greatness and shrink. The Church cannot fear, knowing her Head. She can only fear her own unworthiness. But surely God is setting great things before her, and measures her by the large measure of the sanctuary. She is great in His eyes, whatever she be in ours, and He demands her to act by His measure of privilege and opportunity. . . . More than ever she stands out an aggressive, advancing, contending, missionary Church. The parish that stands still is dead. The diocese that stands still is dead. The Church that stands still is dead. There can be no discharge in this war. It is a charge and an advance to the end. Understand that, ye who lie back and take your ease, content so only the parish 'lives,' as you call it, and 'holds its own.' It does not live, and it does not hold its own, and it has no purpose, if it be not winning on and winning up for the King and the Kingdom continually."

BISHOP WHIPPLE, in a recent letter says: "I close by repeating a story which dear Bishop Clarkson loved to tell: 'A devout colored preacher whose heart was aglow with missionary zeal, gave notice to his congregation that in the evening an offering would be taken up for missions, and asked for liberal gifts. He had in his congregation one well-to-do man who was very selfish, and who said to him before the service: "Yer gwine ter kill dis church ef yer goes on saying, give, give! No church can stan' it. Yer gwine ter kill it!" After the sermon the minister said to the people, "Before the service to-night, Brother Jones tole me I was gwine ter kill dis yere church ef I kep' a asking yer ter give; but, my brethren, churches doesn't die dat way. Ef dere's anybody knows of a church dat's died 'cause it's been giving too much ter de Lord, I'll be very much obliged ef my brother will tell me whar dat Church is, fur I'se gwine to visit it, an' I'll climb up on de walls of dat church under de light of de moon, and cry, "'Blessed are de dead dat die id de Lord!"'"

Pen-and-Ink-lings

A LARGE folio Book of Common Prayer, of 1652, which belonged to Bishop Creighton, who was Bishop of Bath and Wells, England, in 1670, has been returned to its old home in the palace at Wells, and added to the many historic treasures of the library. It is an excellent specimen of the binder's art, having been bound by S. Mearns, the binder to Charles II.

IN an interesting compilation recently made by the Ladies' Home Journal, it was shown that out of the twelve million families in the United States, more than one-third have an annual income of less than $400; twenty per cent. have from $400 to $600; fifteen per cent. have from $600 to $900; while eleven per cent. have from $900 to $1,200. While there are many families possessed of immense wealth and in receipt of large incomes, the fact remains that only nineteen per cent., or less than one-fifth of all the families, have more than $1,200 a year. Whoever has this latter sum may congratulate himself that he is as well off as four-fifths of his neighbors, and far better off than three-fourths of them. There is ground in this for the cultivation of the grace of contentment.

IT is the modern problem par excellence, says a writer in The Atlantic, to combine free self-government with effective police control over large areas which are inhabited by men of different races, with different standards of duty, and different capacity for self-government. In the ancient world, when citizenship meant membership of a city, the problem did not arise as it does with us. But as intercourse develops more and more between the highly civilized peoples and the less advanced races, the problem becomes more pressing.

IN The Independent recently were given the following explanations of the origin of the dollar sign:

1. That it is a combination of the letters U. and S., the initials of United States.
2. That it is a modification of the figure 8, the dollar being formerly called a piece of eight, and designated by the symbol eight-eighths.
3. That it is derived from a representation of the Pillars of Hercules, connected by a scroll. The dollars containing these were called "pillar" dollars.
4. That it is a combination of H S, the mark of the Roman money unit.
5. That it is a combination of P and S, from the Spanish peso sura, signifying hard dollar.
6. That the symbol, in almost its present form, was invented and published in 1797 by the Rev. Chauncey Lee, of Rutland, Vt., and that it was part of a general system invented by him for designating mills, cents, dimes, dollars, and eagles. In his system one stroke designated a mill, two strokes a cent, three strokes a dime, four strokes a dollar, while an eagle was designated by the letter E.

ON a recent Sunday, in St. Clement's church, Belfast, a man who had evidently gone there to protest against Ritualism, said in a loud voice to his neighbor in the same seat during the repeating of the Apostles' Creed: "D'ye hear that. 'Born of the Virgin Mary;' there's Popery for you."

WHEN Lawson Tait, the English surgeon, and his wife were driving through Montreal one hot summer morning, Mrs. Tait, observing large blocks of ice standing opposite each door, remarked: "See what a novel plan they have of keeping the air nice and cool by exposing small icebergs opposite each door."

ONCE asked a district nurse, says a writer in The Cornhill Magazine, how the various sick cases had been going on during my absence from the parish. At once the look which I knew so well crossed her face, but her natural professional pride strove for the mastery with the due unctiousness which she considered necessary for the occasion. At last she evolved the following strange mixture: "Middling well, sir; some of 'em's gone straight to glory, but I am glad to say others are nicely on the mend."

HERE is a suggestive quotation from Harper's Bazar:

A well known and prosperous club opened its new house to the ladies on certain afternoons in June. Everything was opened for inspection—roof-garden, bed-rooms, dining rooms, library and reading rooms, pipe-room, lounging-places, and the swimming pool—a spectacle of luxury, beauty, comfort, and order, that no housewife living could hope to rival, and all for annual dues so small that the price of one inexperienced servant for six months in an ordinary household would exceed it. "I suppose they have a right to it all," one woman sighed. "They make the money to pay for it." "I understand it all now!" some one else exclaimed, laying her hand impetuously on another woman's arm. "This is why nothing at home is ever as it ought to be." The pathos of an undeniable situation, of well-defined lines of alienation between the home and the club, between the man's range of interests and the woman's, his love of creature comforts and her inability to supply them, struck many a woman in fact, and happily some men. "I am not sure I like it," said one man. "I get the best 'inners in the word, all the books I want, every periodical, and all without a bit of trouble. But when I look round at it all, at the luxury and the splendor, and go down to that swimming pool when I am warm, or up to that roof garden, I think of my poor little wife stewing in her apartment at home, wrestling with servants, and with nothing but a five-by-two tub in a dark bathroom to bathe in." Which goes to prove that whatever further separations may afterwards ensue in American establishments, some men, at least, have existed who have not surrendered to the new order without a protest.

THE CREED OF THE AGNOSTIC

Let me, while life leaps in my veins,
Be proud and free;
Let foolish preachers load no chains
Of faith on me—
While I have strength and youth, let facts,
Not legends, guide my thoughts and acts.
While life is at the flood let no
Old notions rise
To turn my gaze from things below
Unto the skies—
Let reason be my master then
And lead me fearless among men.
While vigor lingers in my limbs,
And skies are fair,
I'll waste no time in singing hymns,
I'll have no prayer—
Without a fear of night ahead,
I'll scoff at him who kneels in dread.
I'll have no God to serve or fear,
When strength is mine!
I'll laugh at him who thinks the ear
Of One divine
Hears all the pæans here below,
The songs of faith, the wails of woe!
But when I bend beneath the load
That age lays on,
When darkness settles o'er the road
And strength is gone,
Then from the mists of clouds and doubt,
Let sweet old beams of hope shine out.
Let me, while life leaps in my veins,
Be proud and free;
Let reason firmly hold the reins,
Then, over me—
But when the long night comes, I pray
That Faith be there to show the way!

INDIANS are always interesting, even when they are "tame." We had a blood-curdling adventure with Indians here, in the early days, and we have often laughed over it. The children had gone around the Point for a picnic, taking provisions for the day, potatoes to bake in the coals, marsh-mallows to roast, etc. The sun was about at the noon mark when a passing pedestrian informed the ladies of the family that Indians had landed at the Point that morning, and were camping there. Consternation prevailed. There was not a man in sight, and perhaps a delay of minutes might mean the death or captivity of the children. Perhaps even now the Indians might be preparing to cook them for dinner! So mother seized the revolver, and auntie got a club, and cook got the potato masher, and nurse, the carving knife, and on the warpath these domestic Amazons started. I have no doubt they would have given a good account of themselves had they come face to face with real wild Indians carrying off their children or scalping them. But when they reached the bluff and looked down on the beach and took in the situation, they were nearly overcome, yet not with horror. There was an open tent, with a papoose swinging between the poles, and Indian men, women, children, dogs, and a cat, quietly engaged or sitting and standing around, and there were the dear children trading their potatoes for pretty baskets, and seeming quite at home amidst the squaws and the kettles. Indians have since frequently camped in that place, and have given us no cause for alarm or anxiety. While they come to sell baskets, they are very glad to get old clothes and provisions. They seem to be very poor, but fairly clean and very well behaved.

These Indians are the descendants of the ancient Ottawas, the race of the renowned Pontiac. These, with the Chippewas, were the nomadic powers of this lake region centering at Mackinac. The Ottawas appear to have been less fierce and vengeful than their rivals, though it was a chief of their blood who planned and carried out the massacre of nearly all the English soldiers in the Northwest, in 1763. Parkman's "History of the Conspiracy of Pontiac," gives the story. After the War of 1812, the Indian's occupation on the warpath was gone. He followed a more quiet life, and enjoyed some of the comforts of life. That was his golden age, when he had some of the advantages, without any of the vices, of the white man's civilization. He did not take to it very seriously, however. A little of it seemed to go a long way with him. He learned to make houses in which he could keep warm in winter, and to do a little rough gardening, and was content to stop there.

In 1839, the Rev. Peter Dougherty was sent here by the Presbyterian Board to establish a mission and to convert and civilize the natives. Three or four other white men aided him in teaching the Indians in practical ways, but I believe he was the only minister. His work was doubtless a blessing to the group of families which gathered about him at the head of our little harbor, but nothing permanent seems to have come of it. His wards did not relish the hard, steady work of farming, and did not develop the lands around. Indeed, there was some uncertainty as to the title they might finally secure, and to obviate this, Mr. Dougherty moved them all over across the west bay, sledding on the ice, to what he called New Mission, now Omena. The Indians of the mission are scattered now, not very many of them surviving, but doubtless some took with them inspiration to a better life in this world, with the hope of the better life to come. With other Christian Indians, they (the descendants) hold a camp meeting every summer at some point on the mainland, and I have heard that it is well conducted.

Mr. Dougherty was a graduate of Princeton, energetic, yet gentle and faithful in all things. The account of his labors reminds me of our own Breck in Wisconsin, but the comparison will not hold very far. Dr. Breck was a great spiritual power; he led an associate mission of clergy who extended their work over a large region, and left foundations upon which others have been building since. Mr. Dougherty's mission was more in the line of domestic and industrial education, and in this he was happily aided by the good examples and kind ministrations of the women of the mission, among whom his wife was most helpful. In the "History of the Traverse Region," to which we are indebted, mention is made of Mrs. Dougherty as a woman "of superior natural and educational endowments, with the sincerity, sweet disposition, and polished manners of the ideal Christian lady; the social atmosphere of her home produced a healthful moral effect on all who came within the sphere of its influence."

The Religious Newspaper

THE very radical change in the character of religious papers which has taken place within the last few years is regarded by the Pioneer Press of St. Paul as "a striking proof" that they are "consciously or unconsciously adapting themselves to the needs of their time"; in other words, are recognizing that "their survival as important factors depends very largely on the closeness of their relation with the life of the world."

The simpler explanation, however, is that these formerly religious papers are trying to save themselves from extinction by transforming themselves into secular papers. Twenty-five years ago, and even at a more recent period, some of the most profitable newspaper properties in this country were weekly religious publications. Very considerable fortunes were made by their proprietors, for their circulation was large, and it was maintained steadily by the religious conviction of the denominations they represented. During late years, however, that conviction has been decreasing in strength, and the denominational partisanship upon which they depended for support, once intense, has now been succeeded by a spirit of indifference. This looseness of conviction was manifest also in the papers themselves; instead of building up the religious faith of their readers, they spread among their teachings subversive of it, or at least they were religious Mugwumps, with no definite cause either to sustain or attack. The consequence was that their prosperity declined greatly, or gave place to actual adversity. They lost their distinctive character, and with it their distinctive support. Instead of strong meat for men, they purveyed milk for babes—literary mush and swash and intellectual slops.

We do not speak of the religious papers generally, but only of certain of the more notable and most prosperous examples. The majority have maintained their original character, but their present appearance suggests that they are suffering because of the declining faith which followed the spread among formerly believing people of the unbelieving criticism of the Bible of the Briggs school. The project for a conference on religion in New York next year affords a symptom of this increasing looseness of conviction and indifference to tenets and doctrines which had before kept alive a spirit of partisanship in religion indicative of the earnestness and sincerity of conviction essential to the vitality of Churches. This conference is called by representatives of ten different denominations, once separated by radical conflicts of view. Baptists, Congregationalists, Episcopalians, Methodists, and Presbyterians are to participate in it, along with Unitarians, Universalists, and even Jews. The theological lion and lamb are to lie down together. It has even been suggested that Mohammedans and Buddhists be invited to join, and we cannot see any good reason why they should be excluded from a conference to establish so composite and eclectic a religion.

Of course such an enterprise would not be undertaken if there was not widespread indifference in the orthodox denominations regarding their nominally distinct doctrines and tenets, for there can be no communion between them and Unitarians and Universalists, unless they are prepared to surrender wholly their theological position. They could not possibly get together unless all hands were ready to accept the rationalism of the extremist.

The tone of the formerly religious papers which have now secularized themselves, shows very clearly that they have no definite religious belief to surrender, but are substantially agnostics, with charity and sympathy for all kindred skepticism. This absence of anything like religious conviction is accompanied by a pretentious but feeble neutrality in politics of the Mugwump sort. They seem to be banking on the theory that there is a large demand for insipid political essays; but we question if they will find the investment profitable. Undoubtedly there are some minds incapable of digesting anything stronger than literary and political slops, but the continued vigor of the race indicates that they are a small minority only.

The secularized religious newspaper, therefore, has not improved itself by the transformation, but rather has shown that its excuse for existence was lost when it ceased to perform its distinctive office. It is now neither fish, flesh, nor good red herring, and every healthy and vigorous intellectual appetite rejects it as a savorless and unnutritious diet.—The Sun.

That Fortune. A Novel. By Charles Dudley Warner. New York: Harper & Brothers. 1899. Price, $1.25.

A thoroughly readable story of New York life, a clean, good book, without a line that one would care to blot. The hero, Philip Burnett, is from New England, and the bright, fresh scenes of his boyhood are deftly sketched in. So also we have delightful glimpses of his home life, and the character pictures are well drawn. The heroine, Evelyn Mayick, is the daughter of one of New York's richest men. The only child of her parents, she is jealously guarded from her birth, and is never for one moment from under the watchful eyes of attendants. By a rare good fortune, a Scotch woman, Ann MacDonald, a woman of thorough integrity and excellent intellectual and moral endowments, has the heiress in charge. Under her care she reaches her young womanhood. This is how the author speaks of the happy result of this process of education: "When Philip said that Evelyn was educated in the world of literature and not in the conflicts of life, he had but the keynote of her condition at the moment she was coming into the world and would have to act for herself. The more he saw of her the more was he impressed with the fact that her discrimination, it might almost be called divination, and her judgment were based upon the best and most vital products of the human mind." The effect of this careful training was that "she judged the world as she came to know it, by high standards." The author's reflections on this condition of the heroine's intellectual and moral development are admirably put, and will bear quoting in full: "The world is firmly fixed in the idea that both for its pleasure and profit it is necessary to know good and evil. Ignorance of evil in the world is, however, not to be predicated of those who are familiar only with the great masterpieces of literature, for if they are masterpieces, little or great, they exhibit human nature in all its aspects, and further than this, it ought to be demonstrable, a priori, that a mind fed on the best, and not confused by the weak and diluted, or corrupted by images of the essentially vulgar and vile, would be morally healthy and best fitted to cope with the social problems of life. The Testaments reveal about everything that is known about human nature, but such is their clear, high spirit, and their quality, that no one ever traced mental degeneration or low taste in literature, or want of virility in judgment, to familiarity with them. On the contrary, the most vigorous intellects have acknowledged their supreme indebtedness to them." It is refreshing to read such a reflection in the pages of a popular novel, such a tribute to the enlightening and ennobling quality of the sacred Scriptures. It may be as well to add that "That Fortune" melts away in Wall street, but love and truth and happiness and all the sacred and imperishable verities of life remain for hero and heroine, and for Miss MacDonald, all three of whom every reader will love.

Unity in Diversity. Five Addresses Delivered in the Cathedral, Oxford. By Charles Bigg, D.D. New York: Longmans, Green & Co. Pp. 102. Price, 80c.

This book recalls to mind a visit made some years ago to a quiet vicarage in a remote hamlet in the English Midlands, where we found engaged in the humblest ministry to his little flock, the profound thinker to whom we had listened a few days before as he preached from the pulpit of St. Mary's, Oxford, one of the ablest university sermons we had ever heard. He was the author of this book. So long as such men are scattered throughout the country parishes of our mother Church, the old saying will remain true, "Clerus Anglicanus stupor mundi." In this interesting and scholarly volume, Dr. Bigg undertakes to show how great is the diversity, and at the same time how close may be the unity, of various types of character and schools of thought in the Church Catholic. Taking St. Paul the Mystic, St. Peter the Disciplinarian, and the philosophic writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews as representative Christian teachers, he shows in a very striking way how their diversities of thought and life were harmonized to the vast enrichment of the Apostolic Church. The great principle which he unfolds finds noble expression in these words: "The Redeemer is the Son of Man, the Lord of all human nature. He sits above the floods of opinion; He sees the little brooks and the raging torrents, the broad streams, and the great ocean, and He knows that they are all fed by the same rain which comes down from God, that they all water the earth, and make it fruitful. From Him come all the four rivers; but we dwell on the banks of Gihon or Hiddekel, and think that in our own land only is gold to be found. And so we make the disputes. What we need is to travel up to the great Fountain Head, that Personality which none can see round and none can see over. There we shall learn how all our partial opinions find their completion, and so their harmony, in the Perfect Man."

The Foundations of Zoology. By William Keith Brooks, Ph.D., LL.D., Professor of Zoology in the Johns Hopkins University. New York: The Macmillan Company. Price, $2.50.

If the author could better illustrate in his use of language the great principle of "fitness," which he claims is the governing law of life, he would help us to reach the "foundations" more easily. One must read the whole book in order to understand the introduction. In this the author sums up his purpose as follows: "To show to them who think with Berkeley that 'it is a hard thing to suppose that right deductions from true principles should ever end in consequences which cannot be maintained or made consistent,' that, in my opinion, there is nothing in the prevalence of mechanical conceptions of life, and of mind, or in the unlimited extension of these conceptions, to show that this hard thing to suppose is true." We are not, however, in the least degree convinced that there is no contradiction "between anything we find in our nature, and the ultimate reduction of all nature, including all the phenomena of life and of mind, to mechanical principles." Even the belief in volition and duty and moral responsibility, the author contends, is compatible with the theory of mechanics. The argument seems to be that so far as can be ascertained by the "strictly scientific" method, the order of nature is mechanical, and we have no right to assume that there is anything else. "They stand on treacherous ground, who base positive opinions on negative evidence," he says; yet that is really the underlying "treacherous ground" of the whole treatise. It is true, the author declines to commit himself to the unqualified dogma of molecular mechanics—"I simply do not know, and have no belief whatever on the subject"—yet he seems to follow Charles Darwin in trying to find "a mechanical explanation of that rational judgment which is innate in intelligent human beings"; holding that this may be a part of the physical order of nature; that language itself, even the most rational discourse, may lie entirely within the limits of physical causation. That he is sincere and earnest and courageous in his search for truth, is evident on every page.

The candid admissions of Dr. Brooks as to the unproved and apparently unprovable theory, toward the establishment of which the great work of Darwin was directed, will seem to many a sufficient reward for the careful study of his book. His appreciative treatment of Paley is one of the bright features to be noted. In the failure of science to throw any light on the origin and meaning of personal identity, he says, "the argument from contrivance has the same value, whatever this may be, that it had before natural selection was discovered." He believes that zoology "leaves ample room for a wider theology, which may be independent of research into the sciences." While the tendency of the work is to lead to the adoption of the mechanical theory, without break or intervention, from cosmicist to conscious mind, there is frequent admission that this is not proven. "The progress of science has shown the worthlessness of all the evidence for spontaneous generation." The monistic view that holds to abiogenesis, is "supported by analogy and defended by ignorance." "The essential characteristic of life is fitness. A living organism is a being that uses the world around it for its own good. I, for one, am unable to find, in inorganic matter, any germ of this wonderful attribute." There is much more in this line of thought.

The Dreamers; A Club. By John Kerdrick Bangs. New York and London: Harper & Brothers. Price, $1.25.

This is a "funny" book, and, unlike many of the funny books offered us, it is really and truly funny. The "motif" is a club of thirteen young men who agree to eat at a late supper, viands which provoke dreams, such as cheese, mince pie, boiled pork, etc., and when they next meet to tell their dreams, which a stenographer will take down. This volume contains the "Dreams" as related. Each one is an imitation of some well-known author, and some of them are very droll and very cleverly done. The "Salvation of Findlayson," in the style of Kipling, and "The Overcoat," after W. D. Howells, are both admirable skits. Good and healthy summer reading.

America in the East. By William Eliot Griffis. New York: A. S. Barnes & Co. Price, $1.50.

A well printed and well-illustrated book on a subject now pretty well worn, "America in the East." The chapters have taking titles: "Can We Govern the Philippines?" "The American in Corea." "Can the White Man Live in the Tropics?" etc. They have already appeared in

The Outlook and in Harper's Magazine. The author is a man who lived some years in the countries about which he writes, and has already written much about them. He calls his book, very properly, "A Glance at Our History, Problems, etc., in the Pacific Ocean," for it is only a glance, and a very passing glance. We find very little that is new in the book, but we find the old set forth in a bright, taking way, and we recommend the little volume to those who want to say they read something besides novels during the summer.

Justice to the Jew. The Story of What He Has Done for the World. By Madison C. Peters. New York: F. Tennyson Neely. Price, $1.

The story of this volume is a new revelation of the marvelous endurance, splendid manhood and womanhood of a race that has been despised for centuries. The writer traces the life and work of the Jew in the nation, the arts, sciences, literature, legislation, philanthropy, and in every relationship established between man and man. "Leaders of men" might well be the epitaph of the race. Separate and distinct, they have yet, in spite of persecution and malignment, ranked themselves always on the side of the nation in which they lived, never leading in anarchy, but ever peace-loving and loyal. Mr. Peters has done great service in his book to the world at large, and we commend it most highly for its thoroughness and its fullness of detail and research. The style of the book is equally attractive with the immense amount of information it gives.

An Ode to Girlhood, and Other Poems. By Alice Archer Sewall, with Frontispiece. New York: Harper & Brothers. Price, $1.25.

The author endeavors to write in the style of Swinburne, but does not attain to the flow and music of such verse. The poems have in them much merit, as far as impulse and idea are concerned; but they are quite deficient in the mystery of number, and that delicate echo of sweet sound, which, like a perfume, should pervade all poetry. If the writer has no ear, and is unable to develop the subtle qualities of true rhythm, it is a misfortune, for some of the more simple poems are really graceful, such, for instance, as "The Day after the Death of a Rose." We quote a few stanzas:

"Thy presence in a room
Did lesser things restrain.
At table in my place,
To think upon thy face
Did make me rise and go to thee again.

I played the sweetest airs
Upon the tender keys.
But thou beside me gazing,
Wast sweetness so amazing,
That silence dropped between the harmonies.

And in the silent night,
When I lay down to sleep,
Thy heart so wide awake,
Its most of life to take,
Did force me like a tragedy to weep."

The frontispiece, by H. Siddons Mowbray, is an effective and beautiful bit of decoration.

The Making of Hawaii; a Study in Social Evolution. By William Fremont Blackman. New York: The Macmillan Company. Price, $2.

Professor Blackman has won for himself a universal debt of gratitude for his splendid work on Hawaii. Coming at this time, when the future of the Islands is of the greatest importance to the United States, this book carefully shows the mistakes made by outside nations in their treatment of the Hawaiians, and the possibilities of the race if properly governed. The history of the race since the discovery of the Islands by Captain Cook forms another link in the chain of degeneration of the savage when brought under the influence of the more savage European trader. There were splendid traits in the Hawaiians waiting for development, but many of them were dwarfed and thwarted by misrule. American governors have a task before them which, rightly wielded, may produce a race of colonists worthy of the highest aspirations of our patriots.

Economic Aspects of the Liquor Problem. By John Koren. Boston and New York: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. Price, $1.50.

This is the report of a committee of fifty, constituted "in the hope of securing a body of facts relating to the medical, legislative, ethical, and economic aspects of the [liquor] question, which will serve as a basis for intelligent public and private action." The work of the committee has been well done. The compilation of statistics, the gathering of facts, and the suggestion of results and remedies, have received the utmost care and attention of the committee. The book is a most valuable contribution to one of the burning questions of the day, and its contents should receive careful study from our legislators, mayors, aldermen, and corporations who can control the sale and use of intoxicants.

The Standard Intermediate School Dictionary of the English Language. By James C. Fernald. New York: Funk & Wagnalls. Price, $1.

This is an excellent dictionary for the class of students for whom it is compiled. Handy in size, clear, concise, and well printed, it is calculated to fill a want that must often be felt by scholars when a large dictionary is not available.

"The Temperance Problem and Social Reform," by Joseph Rountree and Arthur Sherwell, of which three editions have been quickly taken up in London, will be published here immediately by Mr. Thomas Whittaker.

BIBLE SERMONS.—We believe that a great mistake is made in depending upon sensational sermons. A congregation, as a whole, is quite receptive and willing to be instructed rather than entertained. To this end we think that Bible-class methods should be carried into the pulpit. Let the minister who laments the fact that he cannot get the older men interested in the work of his Bible-class, try once the effect of bringing the Bible-class to them, administering a dose of Bible-instruction from the pulpit, along the same lines, geographical, archeological, and historical, that obtain in his own study. He will be surprised to find what an attentive congregation sits before him. For the average man, after all the instruction that he had or didn't have "at his mother's knee," has a very indifferent knowledge of the actual facts of Bible history and their relation to the progress of the world, more particularly that of the Old Testament, and this can be made very entertaining matter, say, for a once-a-month sermon, or let us call it a "talk." While other Sundays are taken up with doctrinal, business, or contemporary sermons, allow the seeker after the real facts of religious history, either of Biblical or more recent times, to have his fill occasionally.

The Observer (Presbyterianian)

ARBITRARY CRITICISM.—If everything be conceded to a criticism arbitrarily subjective, if each man considers himself capable of picking and choosing throughout the area of the Divine Word, and if the Bible be treated as a subject for dissection by little human minds, there will be many Bibles with a small "b," but there will remain no Bible in capital letters. When, for example, a "leading scholar" of America declares that there is in the Bible a great deal of "rubbish" and promiscuous "debris," the way is prepared for this man or that man to throw this book or that chapter on his own private rubbish heap, as he sees fit, no supreme Form really remaining by which to judge and direct human life. If one writer can err, so can another; if Paul is wrong, so might John be, even though he leaned upon Jesus's breast; or, for that matter (which is the latest fruit of this vicious subjectivisedissection of Scripture), so might Jesus himself be in error, or even a falsifier. All these scriptural skepticisms are possible where human conceit exalts itself to determine just what the Lord Almighty did say, or ought to have said, to mankind in the way of a revelation. What is needed is a revival of respect for the Bible. The Bible deserves, by reason of all that it has so far done for the race, to be taken upon its own terms. It is not only a good book; it is the best book. It is the authority of God, and it is God's book. There is no rubbish in the Bible. The Scriptures are not the debris of centuries, but the lively and enduring oracles of the great Jehovah.

ETHICS AND BUSINESS.—The doctrine that ethics has nothing to do with business is both atheistic and anarchical. If ethics has no place in business it has no place anywhere; the difference between right and wrong is a mythical distinction; there is no God, and not even a Power in the world that makes for righteousness. The practical effects of the doctrine would be such as would grow out of this atheistical root. It would drive out of business not only brotherhood and sympathy and sincere mutual service, but also justice and right, truth and trust, and turn it into a den of thieves and cut-throats. On such principles, business would be impossible and society would perish. The chief factors in business are not land, labor, and capital, but faith, truth, and right. Without these moral principles as the ground on which to stand, men could have no dealings with one another, and business could not even begin! Not only so, but it is these moral principles that make business profitable. Business that is built on fraud or force is a kind of robbery, that makes some richer by making others poorer, and such business cannot last; but trade that is conducted on principles of mutual truth and trust is profitable all around, and can ever continue to increase its wealth. Successful business men, as a rule, believe in the principles and in the practice of ethics, and their honesty is their most splendid and most profitable capital. The very name "trust" is a highly ethical word, and if this form of business "knows nothing about ethics," it is doing business under false pretences, and should change its name. A certain United States senator once declared that "there is no room for the Ten Commandments in politics," and was speedily retired to private life under a weight of public odium. The business man that "knows nothing about ethics" is flaunting his moral shamelessness before the world, and will excite against himself and against his business its indignant condemnation. It is "ethics" that stands between business and anarchy.

The Household

In Time of Sickness

(CONCLUDED)

THE mighty cottonwoods across the river rose blackly against a blaze of crimson light when a low, white-painted launch swung out from beneath the clustering palms. Two of Langton's Krooboy's crouched forward beneath the warped and blistered sun-deck, and the Hausa soldier leaned over the cockpit coamings, gazing half-amused at the quaint figure in greasy dungarees very busy beside him. Langton, after suffering many things at the hands of the white mechanic sent him out from home to teach the negroes how to run that launch, had decided to become his own engineer. The assistant when most wanted was generally found to be suffering from an overdose of palm wine, which was a point too good to be missed by the cynical traders; while Langton had doubts whether under any circumstances it would be wise to trust so delicate a craft as an oil-launch to the mercies of the Krooboy. Therefore, being a man of resource, he had puzzled over designs and complicated pieces of link motion himself, and now, blackened with soot-of-kerosene and redolent of rancid oil, he bent over the clanking machinery. "All right at last; that's better. Now we're off," he said, and with a cloud of evil-smelling blue vapor that wreathed about her quarters, tainting the air half a mile astern, and the muddy water, which gleamed blood-red about her, boiling beneath the bow, the launch clanged on up stream.

Presently the last faint glow of saffron flickered and died out behind the palms, darkness closed suddenly down, and wisps of fever-mist, heavy with germs of madness and death, crawled out across the river as the forest woke to life.

"Warmed up now, we'll let her go," said Langton, and crank and connecting rod clanged faster and faster, until they reeled and danced before his aching eyes. Here and there the mist rose to the height of the shade-deck, and the tired man stared anxiously ahead, gripping the iron tiller harder, as they swept through the clammy whiteness at nine knots an hour. Then Amadu, the Hausa, who was quite aware of the risk of crushing in the thin plates like an egg-shell against a mighty, drifting log, opened his eyes in wide surprise. The representatives of the government he knew travel fast by night or day through winding creek and foul lagoon, in spite of rending snag, treacherous eddy, and hidden shoal; but it was strange to find that this quietly spoken white man who was neither consul nor officer, thought equally little of the risk.

In places the vapor stood like a solid wall across the creek, but there was no slackening of speed. More oil was pumped into the cylinder. Langton threw the valve open wide, and the white wreaths piled themselves higher and higher against the trembling bow, while the hum and whirr grew louder still, and the little propeller whirled like a dynamo. Then a broad red moon swung up from behind the forest, and the streaks of mist became less frequent, while the river shimmered in silver light. High overhead rose the feathery tufts of the oil palms, and the shadowy undergrowth beneath was filled with mysterious rustlings, as the forest creatures stirred forth to hunt or warfare after the manner of their kind. The atmosphere was like that of a great hothouse, heavy with the smell of steaming earth, the fragrance of lily flowers, and an odor as of all manner of spices. And the launch was going ten knots now.

Later the forests rolled away astern, and they drove onwards through a waste of fetid mire, where the mangroves spread their dingy leaves to hide the foul depths of putrefaction among the crawling roots, and the channels were cumbered with banks of rotting mud. Scaly alligators floundered beneath the oyster-crusts withes, unseen crawling things splashed along the edge of the bubbling mud, and the air was almost unbearably with the sour odors of decay. But neither the pen of a Dante, nor the weird pencil of Dore, could adequately depict an African mangrove swamp at night. It is fantastic, unearthly, horrible, and the shadow of death, and torments worse than death, brood heavily above it. And all the time the worn-out European, soaked in clammy fever-damp, and dazed from want of sleep, stood like a silent statue gripping the helm, for he knew that the launch was running a grim race for a white man's life that night. He quite understood that he was in greater peril now than he had been in the native village, for one rasp against a submerged water-logged trunk would leave them to the mercy of the alligators, while not even a Jakkery could traverse the mangrove roots. There are also compensations, even in Africa, where the white man does not, as a rule, receive infection from a native, which is strange, considering that he, too, suffers from similar ailments.

The engines had settled to their work, and were doing their utmost now, and as the miles reeled by astern, Amadu, the Hausa took the helm at intervals, while Langton bent over them, oil-can in hand. Then, as they swept out of a tunnel-like channel beneath the mangrove boughs, he suddenly checked the valve and jammed the tiller down. A tier of yellow lights glimmered right overhead through drifting mist, and a startled hail came down from the lofty iron bows that towered blackly above them. "Launch ahoy; look out there—look out," it said. The little craft swayed sharply down as she felt the helm, and even the Hausa held his breath when she scraped past the great steel stem. Then swinging round in a semi-circle, with panting engines, she ground against the weed-crusts side which rose like a wall before her. It was one of the irregular mailboats which churn their way far inland through the tangled creeks to collect palm oil from the scattered factories, waiting for the dawn, and as a sudden thought struck Langton he clutched at the half-lowered accommodation ladder, and hurried up on deck.

He found the purser, whom he knew, sorting papers in a sweltering room, and explained his presence briefly, adding, with an assurance he was far from feeling: "I know you will spare me a block of ice—it may save the poor fellow's life." The good-natured official wrinkled his brows. "If it had been any one else I would have laughed at you," he said. "We have very little left, and have cut it off the passengers—South Coast Belgians growling like bears because they have to drink tepid wine—but we've eight men down, some of them raving already. Still, I suppose you want it badly or you would not have asked." Then he rose and pounded on the doctor's door. "Do you hear, Pills; I'm going to give Mr. Langton a block of ice, and he'll ransom your bottle shop as well. Hyah, Frypan, tell them steward-man quick." Langton hurriedly selected a few things he needed, and when they shook hands the purser said: "You are in a desperate hurry, not even a glass of wine? Well, you are an unsociable man, and certainly a very grimy one, but good luck go with you," and Langton hurried on board the launch, with the precious ice wrapped in a blanket.

It was burning day when they came panting into sight of the Salu factory, after winding round through endless creeks, for not even a native could find his way by night through the network of narrow tunnels beneath the mangrove boughs. By that time Sergeant Amadu was filled with a deep respect for his white companion. "This man should have been a soldier," he afterwards said. Under the best of circumstances an oil launch is an uncleanly craft to drive, and when she has been experimented upon surreptitiously by inquisitive Krooboy's, matters are not improved. Langton was, therefore, as the purser had said, a very grimy man. His face was blackened with soot of kerosene, and his duck garments smeared with oil, but when the traders met him at the landing with an offer of refreshment, his reply was characteristic. "We'll see the sick man first, the rest can wait," he said.

Lee fidgeted uneasily as they walked towards the house. "It was very good of you to come," he presently observed. "Perhaps it would be better to let that little difference of opinion drop. We'll overlook what you said."

Much suffering and many disappointments had failed to quench Langton's sense of humor, and there was a twinkle in his eye as he answered: "Let it be postponed, then, and I will tackle you again some day. I haven't changed my mind, you know."

When he had finished his examination his face was very grave, and bending over the sufferer's couch he put the matter plainly, for in the fever-swamps, where death is very near to every European, men do not hide the truth in times like this. "I must warn you that you are very ill," he said, gently. "So ill that I see nothing for it but the ice bath—I presume you know the risk?"

A faint smile flickered in the sick man's face as he gasped: "I can understand; no one could live long at a temperature of one hundred and six, and without sleep for many nights. Do what you think best."

Then Langton turned to the traders: "Crush all the fresh limes you have, pour vinegar on them, and the coldest water. There's no time to lose; I have brought some ice."

Lee opened his eyes. "I could not have bought a piece like that for five pounds just now," he said; and Langton answered: "Be thankful, then, that there are still people who will give what money cannot buy."

Afterwards the strangely assorted trio, two reckless gin traders and the representative of a body whose emissaries, though they make mistakes at times, have poured out their blood like water in the fever-land, fought a grim battle for that officer's life. More than once it seemed that the hand of death was stronger than human skill, for the chilly ice water threatened to quench the flickering life as well as the fire of fever; but Langton knew his work, and the flame did not go out. It was done at last, and

Alton, wrapped in dry blankets, was carried back to the veranda for the sake of the passing coolness, where he lay white and still, occasionally rambling incoherently. "If he would only sleep," said Langton to trader Lee, when he had changed his garments and swallowed a morsel of food. "Can't you rig a draught screen to catch the little air? You two can rest if you need it. I dare not leave him now."

So, together with the faithful Hausa who steadfastly refused to leave his master's couch, the tired man sat himself down to watch. The sun southed and rolled westward, and the temperature steadily increased, until the dust of the scorching compound beneath would have burned the incautious foot. The palm fronds ceased their dry rustle, and the forest lay silent, sweltering in fervent heat. And through it all, fable follower of the Prophet and white Christian watched and waited in uncomplaining silence, the barriers between them melting away beneath a power which is greater than the distinctions of color and race. Late in the afternoon Ellory returned with a little fruit and food, and said, softly: "Any improvement yet?" but Langton shook his head.

"I am afraid not," was the grave answer. "He talks at times, but his mind seems to wander—we can only hope for sleep." Afterwards no one spoke, and the shadows lengthened across the compound until the palm tufts were black lacework against crimson fire again, and the mist rose like steam from off the quaking swamps. A column of blue vapor curled up above the huts of the Krooboy laborers, and the monotonous tapping of a monkey-skin drum came quivering through the listless air.

The sick man, whose eyes were half-open now, turned a ghastly face towards them, and seemed to listen. "Ah, a Krooboy drum, and I thought I was at home," he said, faintly and incoherently. "I am going home—no, I remember now. Dying—Langton knows, I saw it in his face. Ellory, you won't forget the letters, or I'll haunt you. Poor Kate, she watches every mail. I must have dreamt I heard her speaking now."

Langton raised his hand. "You must not talk," he said, soothingly; but the low voice went on: "Lift me up, and let me see the sunset." The big Hausa sergeant raised the wasted shoulders in his arms, and the sick man, gazing wistfully down the shimmering river, the highway to the sea, rambled on: "Yes, I'm going home. English meadows instead of fever-swamps—you know the English air. No, I'm always forgetting. Lay me down, I'm tired, very tired."

"Light-headed, poor fellow. I'm afraid he's near the end," said Lee, softly, as he drew near the missionary's side; and Amadu laid his master down. A last red gleam touched the transparent forehead, and the weary eyelids closed. The Hausa leaned forward, staring breathlessly, and Ellory's eyes were misty as, choking down something in his throat, he said: "Beyond the fever now."

Then a firm grasp closed upon his arm, he was led quietly but forcibly away, and a steady voice answered: "No—it's sleep, life-giving sleep. We dare not move him, and we'll have to chance the damp. His life is trembling in the balance still, and I must hold out yet." All night Langton watched again, with the Hausa, asleep at last in spite of his efforts, slumbering beside him, until in the coolness of the dawn he rose thankfully to his feet, knowing that the crisis was past. "Allah has spared your master's life," he said; and the big Moslem, standing erect, turned his face towards the brightening east. Then awakening and giving a few brief instructions to the traders, Langton crawled away to his quarters and slept like a log for ten hours on end; while when the Hausa descended the creaking stairway he laid a grip on Ellory's arm which the trader remembered all that day, as he said in the tongue of the North: "There are many infidel teachers, and some are doubtless of the white bushmen. I, Amadu, have seen them—but this is a leader of men."

A week later Langton who had many things to do meantime, came back to that factory, and carried Alton away in his odoriferous launch, through a maze of foul creeks, to overtake the mailboat at a group of factories. He stayed on board two days, with his launch towing astern, and then took leave of his patient as they neared the river mouth. Alton, weak as a child, but past all danger, lay in a canvas lounge beneath the saloon deck awnings, and his sunken eyes were bright with hope. "Words cannot thank you for what you have done," he said. "Is there any way I can show my gratitude?"

Langton smiled a little. "We do not do this work for a reward," he answered slowly. "There are those who speak ill of us upon the coast, and when you hear such speech, you can say that we try to do our best, and you speak with authority, you know. And now good-by, and new health in the dear old land."

The two men grasped hands, and Langton, standing on the deck of his little oil launch, watched the mailboat steam out across the tumbling bar until her smoke was only a dim smear upon the rim of the turquoise semi-circle. Then choking down a sigh, he went back to his work among the swamps.—Harold Bindloss in Good Words.

Bennyfit 1. Sunday Skools is a grate bennyfit to childerns fathers and mothers. It gives em peece and happiness. Every Sunday morning my Pa and Ma gets up late coz Pa is always tired Sundays. After breakfast Pa always says come hussle round childern and go to Sunday Skool, for Pa is tired and wants a little peece and rest Sundays. Then Pa goes and lays down on the sof and smokes and reads papers all the forenoon. Ma she sees to gettin dinner, for Pa says he must have a good dinner on Sunday, anyway. Ma has to take care of the baby, too, fer the hired gal is a cathlick and says she wont stay home from Church fer nobody and Ma bein a protestan has to mind her.

Bennyfit 2. Sunday Skools save childern's Pas and Mas from going to church. One day the minister was up to our house and he told Pa and Ma they ort to go to Church. And Pa says, O, I send all my childern to Sunday Skool, and gess that will have to do. And so Ma and Pa dont go to Church, but Ma says she would like to.

Bennyfit 3. Sunday Skools saves childerns payrents a good deal of money. When the minister told Pa he ort to help pay the Church expenses, Pa said O I give my childern a nickel a peece every Sunday to take to the Sunday Skool. But the minister said, yes, but the childern gets it all back again in Cards and Books and Picknicks, and Krismas trees. And Pa said, well it is all I can afford.

Bennyfit 4. Sunday Skool saves the big boys and girls from goin to Church. When the boys gets big enuff to smoke and to not mind their Pas, then they stop goin to Sunday Skool. Only they go to Church some nites when the girls go along, and then they all set in back seats and chew gum. My Pa told Jim my big brother that he ort to go to Church reglar. But Jim said there aint no need of my goin more'n there is of your goin. I have as much rite to stay at home as you have. But Pa said he was tired on Sundays. Pa keeps a store, but every day he says times are so hard he don't sell much and don't have much to do.

Bennyfit 5. Sunday Skools make the Teechars study up things. My Teechar was over to our house and Ma said shed ketch her. So she said, Miss Jenny which is the oldest, the Cathlick Church or the Jewish Church. My Teechar said, I am not sure, but I think the Cathlick Church. My Ma said she sposed so too, but any how there want much difference. My Pa thinks it is the duty of Sunday Skool Teechars to study up and know things. When we ask him about God, or something else we want to know very bad, he always says, you are a leettle ahead of me, go and ask your Sunday Skool Teechar, thats what shes put there fer to teechar you. Jim thats my big brother said to Pa, how much wages does Sunday Skool Teechars get. Pa said they don't get no wages. They Teechar fer love. Then Jim said what do they love your childern so much fer, and why dont you teechar your own childern for love. And Pa he got mad and told Jim he was sassy.

Bennyfit 6. Sunday Skools do a great deal of good to childern. If it warnt for them they wouldnt know nothing. Fer their Payrents haint got no time to teechar em. Childern learn songs and verses and things. If they go reglar and don't miss they get big pay fer learnin to be good. But when I am a little bigger I am goin to do as Pa does and stay at home Sundays, and smoke and read the papers and have some of Mas big dinners.

Bennyfit 7. There is a grate many more bennyfits to Sunday Skools but I dont know any more.—Jonnie Crum, in Young Churchman.

Antiquity of the Carpenter's Plane

A VERY interesting discovery has been made at the Roman city of Silchester. The excavators came across a dry well, which, on being explored, proved quite a little museum of antiquities. Some fifteen feet down, a Times correspondent says, the diggers found an urn-shaped pottery vase, about a foot in length, quite intact, and, curiously enough, protected by lumps of chalk built around it. The vase, which probably originally contained some precious substance, was, however, quite empty. Above it were deposited a great number of iron implements, most of which were in a wonderful state of preservation. They seem to have been the tools of a carpenter and a coppersmith or silversmith, with some miscellaneous objects of blacksmith's work thrown in. The principal specimen is a carpenter's plane of quite modern type, although unquestionably more than 1,500 years old; three or four axes, retaining their fine cutting edges and still quite serviceable; a number of chisels and gouges of all shapes and sizes, hammers, adzes, saws, files, etc. In the smith's department may be specified a brazier for burning charcoal, quite complete, two or three anvils of different sizes and shapes, a fine pair of tongs adapted for lifting crucibles, a curious tripod candelabrum lamp, or candlestick, and several other curious objects, the precise uses of which have not yet been determined. In addition, there are several large bars of iron, a couple of plowshares, and a broken sword. Probably more will be found deeper down in the well. This is undoubtedly the most important find at Silchester since the discovery of the bronze Roman eagle, now at Strathfieldsayes, some years ago.—Scientific American.

A Good Story

THE rector of a Somersetshire village, chiefly inhabited by small farmers and their laborers, was being helped one Sunday by a visitor in his house, who had once before preached for him a very learned sermon, utterly over the heads of the congregation. The rector begged him this time to use the very simplest language, and was answered: "Yes, certainly. You shall tell me afterwards if I have used one sentence that your people will not have understood." The sermon was preached, and in the evening the preacher was rather hurt at being told that there was more than one sentence which could not have been understood. "Tell me one, pray." "Well, you told them to 'draw their own inference' from certain facts." "But, my dear fellow, everyone knows what it is to draw an inference." "Well," said the rector, "we'll ask my groom-gardener. He is one of the most intelligent men in the village, and you shall hear what he says." Accordingly, on Monday, they sought Robert in the garden, and after a little talk about strawberries and netting and so on, the rector said: "You heard my friend, Mr. H., preach yesterday, Robert?" "Oh yes, sir; very nice, very nice." "You understood all he said?" "Oh yes, sir, surely; very nice, very nice!" "Did you hear him tell you to 'draw your own inference'?" What do you think he meant?" "Oh, yes, sir. I heard him say it, and—why—well—I don't know as I zackly understood; but I were certing o' this, that if it were anythin' in reason, our mare ud draw it!"

IN "The Story of my Life," by Augustus Hare, he relates this of an Oxford undergraduate:

"One day a man said to him, 'How do you do, R.?' and he answered, 'Quite well, thank you.' The next day the man was astonished at receiving from R. the following note: 'Dear Sir:—I am sorry to tell that I have been acting a deceptive part. When I told you yesterday that I was quite well I had really a headache; this has been upon my conscience ever since.' The note amused the man whose name was Burton, and he showed it to a friend who, knowing R.'s weakness, said to him: 'Oh, R., how could you act so wrongly as to call Mr. Burton "dear sir," thereby giving him the impression that you liked him, when you know that you dislike him extremely?' R. was sadly distressed, and a few days later Mr. Burton received the following: 'Burton, I am sorry to trouble you again, but I have been shown that, under the mask of friendship, I have been for the second time deceiving you; by calling you "dear sir" I may have led you to suppose I liked you, which I never did, and never can do. I am, Burton, yours, etc.'"

A TRUE BRAIN

Can be Built by the Right Materials.

The statement is made and is susceptible of proof that brains are built somewhat as a wall or house is built of certain defined and well understood things.

Wood may be the principal and largest article in a house, but it cannot be formed into a house without the nails, bolts, or screws to hold it in shape.

We know that albumen is the bulkiest thing used by Nature in building a human brain; but albumen alone does not make a brain. It requires the small particles of Phosphate of Potash (like the nails in the house) to form the albumen into what is known as gray matter in brain and nerve tissue.

The albumen exists in large quantities in a variety of food.

The Phosphate of Potash is found in its truest form in certain parts of field grains. When a man shows brain fag, or a woman shows nervous symptoms, it is prima facie evidence that the Phosphate of Potash is used up faster than the food supplies it. Therefore either quit the worrying work or get food strong in the natural Phosphate of Potash, to more quickly and surely replace the daily loss.

That is the especial errand of the famous food, Grape-Nuts.

Good, sturdy nerves and a healthy, active, tireless brain, will make a man rich where he is sure to fail when the brain is unable to carry out the behests of the mind.

Remember that Phosphate of Potash as a drug, will not do, for Nature takes kindly only to such body builders when presented in food as prepared in Dame Nature's own laboratory.

Grape-Nuts are to be found in all first-class groceries, and once tried the delicious flavor will never be forgotten, while the feeling of increased strength and vigor of brain and nerves will tell its own tale.

A Birthday Temper

"NO jam!" Gilbert's face, which had been a sunshiny, birthday face when he sat down, became suddenly overcast, and his eyes filled with tears.

"Cry-baby!" said Tom, in a whisper, but loud enough for Gilbert to hear; and he responded by a kick, which missed the offender's leg, but hit his little sister Janie's, and made her set up a dismal wail.

"What is the matter?" said the governess, looking up from the teapot.

"Gilbert's crying," burst forth Tom and Edward, in one breath, "because it's his birthday, and there's no jam, and he kicked Janie because we laughed."

"Oh, Gilbert," said Miss Ellward, reproachfully, "I did not think you were so greedy!"

Gilbert hung his head; he was not greedy. What had vexed him was, not the loss of the jam, but that Miss Ellward should have forgotten his birthday; but he was too proud and angry to explain.

Poor little boy! his temper was a trial to himself and everyone else, and sometimes prevented even his own family from understanding what an upright, affectionate child he was.

"Remember this afternoon, Gilbert," said Miss Ellward, rather anxiously.

Gilbert started, and recollected himself, making a brave effort to look pleasant again. He had really hurt his brothers and sisters more than once lately in his fits of passion, and Miss Ellward had told him that if it happened again she must punish him severely.

Mrs. Weber was away, and the little Webers were an anxious charge to their governess, for though they had many good points, they were difficult children to manage, because of Gilbert's violent temper, and his brothers' teasing ways.

It had been settled that, in honor of Gilbert's birthday, they were to have a donkey-ride that afternoon, to some place in the neighborhood, and a gypsy tea, and the fear of losing this treat restored Gilbert to good humor.

"Has it been decided where we are to go?" said Miss Ellward, looking at Gilbert, for the owner of the birthday had generally the chief voice in deciding what the treat was to be, and Gilbert answered promptly:

"Oh, please, to the castle."

He was a clever little boy, and very fond of history, and he had always longed to go to this old castle, that was just beyond a walk for the younger ones. But his brothers gave a howl of dismay.

"That musty old castle far away from the sea! Oh, do let us go to Featherstone Bay instead!"

Miss Ellward felt uneasy. This threatened to be a stormy birthday; but a donkey-ride was a treat in itself, and Gilbert did not wish to risk losing it by a display of temper.

We'll go to Featherstone Bay instead," he said, quite pleasantly, though he had not forgiven Miss Ellward yet for forgetting his birthday, and was secretly hurt that the others did not say so much as "thank you."

It was a holiday, and he slipped away by himself, thinking that was the best way of safeguarding his temper and the promised treat. His father had given him a delightful book, and he was soon deep in it. But when in a good humor, he was the cleverest of them all at inventing interesting games, and his brothers were aggrieved at his desertion.

"Let's poke him up," said Tom; but his elder sister Mary who knew the nature of Tom's poking up, said:

"Please don't, Tom; you will make him angry, and then he will lose the treat."

"Nonsense, you old hen!" and Tom and Edward ran off.

"Hi, Pugnose," they shouted joyfully, as they caught sight of Gilbert in the summer-house.

Now, if there was one thing that roused Gilbert, it was that horrid nickname, and his only answer was a savage growl.

"We want you," said the others, roughly, making a dive at his book.

But Gilbert snatched it back. "I want to read. Can't you leave me in peace? I gave up to you."

"Gave up?" The others gave a whistle of derision. "Mr. Greedy please myself, Pugnose!"

Alas for poor Gilbert! his good resolutions vanished, and all the smothered wrath of the morning broke out at once.

"Take that!" he cried violently, and flung the book at his brother's head.

Tom dodged it cleverly, but it struck little George who had run up behind, on his shoulder, and literally bowled him over. At that moment Miss Ellward appeared on the scene. As soon as she had ascertained that the child was only frightened and not seriously hurt, she said, sorrowfully:

"I can't let you go with the rest this afternoon, now."

"I don't care!" shouted Gilbert, and rushed away.

When Mr. Weber strolled down towards the arbor early in the glowing June afternoon, he found a miserable little heap curled up on the seat in it.

Gilbert jumped to his feet, as red as the roses that clambered outside, at the sound of his father's voice.

"I want you to come for a walk with me, Gil."

Mr. Weber had rarely time for a walk with his boys, and now Gilbert could scarcely believe his ears that he was going to bestow one of his hard-earned holiday walks on himself—the offender. He scarcely noticed which way they were going, in his surprise, and his father did not speak for some time. At last he said:

"Tell me all about it, Gil."

The kind voice made Gilbert long to pour

Vitality

Many children while appearing strong and rugged really have little vitality. Other things being equal the child with the most vitality is bound to have less sickness, and what sickness there is will be of a mild character. Mellin's Food gives vitality; it nourishes every part of the body and furnishes material for proper growth and development and this results in vitality and vigor.

Mellin's Food

children are strong and rugged, they have a large amount of vitality and are in a condition to, and do, resist disease better than those fed on starchy and improper foods. Mothers should remember this when selecting a food for their baby.

I have a son 17 months old who has taken Mellin's Food since he was 10 weeks old. He is in perfect health and has been so through the summer, although there has been much sickness and many deaths among babies in our city. I feel confident that we owe to Mellin's Food our baby's fine condition. We have recommended Mellin's Food to many mothers. Mrs. C. F. Sawtelle, 256 Winthrop Ave., New Haven, Conn.

forth the tangled tale of his grievances and his late outburst, but somehow he could not get beyond: "They will call me pugnose."

"Really?" said his father, with an odd little smile. "Why, that was my nickname at school."

Gilbert looked at his father's well-shaped nose, and a smile curled his own lips; he said no more about this particular grievance, which had become suddenly dignified.

"I did want to keep my temper," he said, sadly, "because of this afternoon; but I don't know what was wrong with me. It was no use trying, after all."

"Perhaps there was something wrong with the motive. Suppose we try a better one for the future, my child."

This was all his father said, but Gilbert understood him.

"Now, Gilbert, my man, can you step out?" said Mr. Weber presently, in quite a different tone of voice, and Gilbert did step out with a will; it was impossible to feel tired when his father talked of all the things he was most interested in.

"There it is!" said Mr. Weber, as they turned a corner.

And Gilbert gave a jump; it was the castle!

"And—why, there are the others!" he cried in a puzzled tone, as there was a wild whoop, and the children came rushing down in a little crowd to meet them.

Tom and Edward looked just a little sheepish.

"It's a make-up," they whispered.

"Well, Gilbert," said his father, as he bade him good-night that evening, "the birthday has not been such a failure after all, has it?"

"It has been just splendid, papa!" And it was true; Gilbert's temper had come triumphantly through the afternoon, even through one or two trials, for even with the best intentions, Tom and Edward could not leave off teasing all at once. "I mean to try always now," he said.

Mr. Weber looked down at Gilbert's bright face, and his own grew grave.

"My little boy," he said, "one does not conquer a bad temper in one afternoon—or in many afternoons," he added, with a sigh. Then Gilbert understood how it was that his father knew all about it.—Canadian Churchman.

Carpenter Shop Persiflage

The Carpenter had put down his tools and gone for his luncheon.

"Life with me is a perfect bore," said the Auger.

"I'm a little board myself," said the Small Plank.

"There's no art in this country," observed the Screwdriver. "Everythings' screwed in my eyes."

"You don't stick at anything long enough to know what you're driving at," interjected the Glue.

"That's just it," said the Screw. "He never goes beneath the surface the way the Jack Plane and I do."

"Tut!" cried the Saw. "I go through things just as much as you do. Life's stuffed with sawdust."

"Regular grind," said the Grindstone.

"I agree with you," observed the Bench. "It doesn't make any difference how well I do my work, I'm always sat on."

"Let's strike," said the Hammer.

"That's it!" cried the Auger. "You hit the nail on the head that time."

"I'll hit it again," retorted the Hammer, and he kept his word, but he hit the wrong nail. That is why the Carpenter now wears his thumb in a bandage. It was his thumb nail the Hammer struck.—Hopper's Bazar.

Who Drank Baby's Milk

"When your papa was a little boy," said grandma, "we lived away out West in a little log cabin, just your grandpa and I, and I had to do all my own work, milking, weeding the garden, and taking care of my chickens. Your papa (you know his name was Tommie, too) did not have any nurse, but he was the best of babies. Every day before I went out doors to attend to my work I would put him in his crib with his bottle of milk, and he would go to sleep by himself. He was not cross and did not cry if I left him in the house by himself."

Tommie turned red, for that was the reason of his temper that morning; there was no one in the house when he woke up.

"For a long while his one bottle of milk would be enough until dinner time, but one day I came back and found the milk all gone and Tommie very hungry. He could say a few words, and he kept on begging 'bottly,' 'milk,' until I gave him some more. The little fellow drank it as if he were almost starved."

"I did not understand it, but your grandpa just laughed, and thought it showed that baby was growing; yet I did not feel quite satisfied when the same thing happened the next day. I asked a lady who had ever so many children, whether two bottles of milk would hurt my baby. She thought something must be wrong with Tommie, and I had a good cry over him that night, but he was so cute and rosy and plump and good that I couldn't believe he was much sick, and just kept on giving him two bottles for a week."

"Then one day I happened to go back to the house, and just as I got to the door I heard Tommie crying, 'Top! top!' I ran in, and there I found—what do you suppose I found drinking your papa's milk?"

Tommie guessed a cat and a dog, but grandma shook her head.

"We did not have a cat or a dog."

"Tell me; tell me quick," begged Tommie.

"Well, there was your papa, with his tiny fists doubled up, beating a—a big black snake that had its mouth on the bottle and was drinking the milk as fast as it could."

Tommie was so astonished! "What did you do, grandma?" was his first question, when he could say anything.

"I don't know how I did do it. I managed to jerk your papa up and to run screaming out of the house. Your grandpa was right near, and got there in time to kill the snake, a great big thing, seven feet long. It had been stealing all my baby's lunch for a week, but your papa didn't scream about it; your papa was not a cry-baby."

Tommie looked very solemn; he climbed down from grandma's lap, stroked Kittie Snow forgivingly, ate his bread and milk without another fretful word; and after that Tommie tried hard to be like the manly boy his papa was, for grandma told him stories about him every day.—Ex.

Finance and Commerce

EVERYBODY is optimistic about the business situation, and whether writing about it or talking of it, everyone finds delight in an exultant prophesy about the future. Certainly conditions are most satisfactory. The exchanges of the country are the largest on record. Statistics of railway earnings are without parallel. Demand for manufactured commodities is good, and prices are uniformly firm and without tendency, so far, towards reaction. For the year just ended, while there was a decrease in exports of agricultural products of 86 million dollars, exports of manufactured articles increased 52 millions. Many regard this increase in iron foreign trade for manufactured goods as all important, and more than compensating for the loss in demand for our farm products. We must confess, however, that, as it's all a question of dollars in the end, we do not exactly see where the gain comes in. Of course it is gratifying to our national pride, after having been able to undersell the world and the cheap labor of India and Russia in the matter of grain, to also be able to compete with the old countries of Europe in their own markets for manufactured goods. It gives us a comfortable sort of sensation, and we at last feel that we belong to the industrial family of nations. That is all very well as a matter of pride, but when it comes down to the settlement of international balances, a sale of two dollars' worth of manufactured goods is not equal to the sale of three dollars' worth of wheat, cotton, or pork, and the difference will have to be paid in gold dollars. Business is magnificent, there is no question about it, and it is quite likely to continue so for some time to come. But it is not improbable, also, that it is just almost as good as it is going to be. We do not mean that there are dangers imminent, only that in the ceaseless rhythm of motion in the waves of expansion and depression that unfailingly follow each other in the business world, we are possibly about on the pinnacle of this term of prosperity. Of course business has a momentum that will carry it along for months without perceptible diminution in retardation, but there are forces ahead that will in time put on the drag. In the first place, there is the approaching presidential campaign which always operates to a greater or less degree for stagnation. Then there is the gradual and, we think, inevitable tightening of the money market now plainly perceptible, and which we have been forecasting for weeks. The enlarged business all over the country has enlarged credits—expanded them. Nearly every kind of business is being pushed to its limit, and in a very large percentage of cases, the business itself has been enlarged to meet this, and more money must be had. With an inflexible monetary system, the only way we can increase our money supply is to import gold. Here, too, our own prosperity is beginning to operate against us. For the year just ended, the balance of trade in our favor was 85 million dollars less than the preceding year. Prosperity here is accompanied by advancing prices which tend to decreased exports and increased imports. It is quite likely the ensuing year will show a still greater shrinkage in our credit balance with the outside world. The sharp advance in the price of all manufactured articles in this country the past six or eight months is very certain to be felt in time, and show in a curtailment of sales abroad. Our winter wheat crop was a failure. Half a crop is about a fair estimate. It is almost equally certain that our spring wheat crop will also fall much below estimates of a month ago, so that against a total wheat crop of 650 to 700 million bushels last year, we will this year have a crop of about 450 millions. This will leave us practically with little more than the remaining surplus of last year's crop for export. Of provisions, too, it now looks as if our surplus for the coming year will be less than for the past, on account of the fewer number of young hogs in the country.

We still think, as we have before intimated, that the tendency from this time on will be toward the exportation of gold. Last week's bank statement in New York was again unfavorable. Reserves decreased notwithstanding a further decrease in loans, and rates for money are firmer. This practically reflects the general financial condition of the country. Again we say there is nothing alarming in all this, but seasons of prosperity have their limitations, and it is just as well to keep in mind the silent and unseen forces which tend to produce the change.

Imports and Exports

THE completion of the year's statistics of imports and exports has enabled the Treasury Bureau of Statistics to present a statement of imports of all articles whose value in the fiscal year 1899 exceeded $1,000,000, comparing the same with the imports of 1898 and 1899. This statement, which comprises about 95 per cent. of the total imports, gives a satisfactory picture of the year's business and the articles in which there has been an increase or decrease in importations, so far as can be shown by the statements of values. In certain cases, however, the apparent increase or reduction is, by reason of the change in values, greater than really exists. In coffee, for instance, the 1897 figures show importations valued at $81,544,884; those of 1898, $65,067,631, and 1899, $55,274,646. The 1899 figures as to values are thus 32 per cent. below those of 1897, while in fact the importations of 1899 are nearly 100,000,000 pounds greater than those of 1897, the reduced figures of the statement in dollars being due to the reduction in price. In sugar, the conditions are reversed, prices abroad in 1899 being higher than in 1897, so that 3,980,250,569 pounds of sugar imported in 1899 cost nearly as much as 4,918,905,733 pounds imported in 1897, the statement of values being in each case based upon the value in the country of production.

In jewelry and diamonds the large increase is believed to be due to the fact that a larger proportion of the diamonds brought in voluntarily pay duty since the reduction of the rates of duty made by the existing law. In manufactures of wool, a considerable proportion of the decrease is in rags and shoddy, the two classes, "rags, noils, and wastes," and "shoddy, mungo, and flocks," having fallen from 49,913,732 pounds in 1897 to 3,298,751 pounds in 1898, and 314,540 pounds in 1899.

To Launder Embroidered Linens

THE first point to make sure of is to wash the fabric clean. The soap must be entirely free from alkali of any sort; pure castile soap is safest. The water should be comfortably hot to the hand, and a good lather should be made. To this, add a teaspoonful of powdered borax. Do not rub the soap on the linen; rub it rather on the hands when more is needed. Wash out any spots by rubbing between the hands, but aside from this, cleanse the fabric by plunging it up and down. The borax will take out all dust and leave the linen quite white. Thorough rinsing is now necessary. The article should be dipped in one fresh water after another, until no soap remains in it. If any of the colors should run, it will be because of so-called "loose dye." In such a case, turn on the cold-water faucet and let the water pour through the linen; this will carry it off. The color rarely runs if the best silks are used, and only in the first washing. The drying of embroidered linens is especially important. The water should be squeezed out, not wrung out. The article should then be tossed in a fresh, soft towel, well shaken, and tossed again. It should not be hung until partially dry—dry beyond the possibility of having the water move in it. Constant shaking will hasten the drying, which ought to be accomplished quickly.

The piece should be absolutely dry before the pressing is undertaken—for this reason: it destroys the silk to apply heat to it while wet. This is the point of care-taking in ironing. The linen must be dampened in order to iron it properly—to stiffen it and to make it perfectly smooth and fresh—but the silk not at all. When the steam caused by the hot iron on the wet silk goes through, it dulls and flattens it, and even stamps on it the impression of the woof and warp of the ironing sheet. It is likely, moreover, to force the dye out into the linen. A damp cloth laid over the back of the work will accomplish the same result when the hot iron is applied to it.

When the piece is dry, lay it, face downward, on a fine sheet folded six or eight times. A thick pad made with an ironing blanket, etc., should not be used, as some suppose. With a wet velvet sponge dampen sections of the linen—of a centre piece, for instance, about one fourth. The sponge can be passed quickly over the embroidery, for the linen will absorb the moisture more readily than the silk. The linen and the stitches of the embroidery should now be drawn carefully into place. A hot iron, one that will just escape scorching, should be at hand, and should be passed quickly over the piece, with no intermediate cloth between, but directly on the reverse side of the work. Iron with the grain of the linen, never on the bias. It is very necessary to remember this when pressing around linen. Commence with the scallops on the straight; afterwards, in a second touching up, these may be pressed directly out, so pointing them firmly into place. So far as the first pressing is satisfactory, it is better not to iron over a second time, as this takes out the stiffening the first has put in. A very hot heavy iron will do the work at once, if skillfully handled. The entire work requires skill, which can be acquired by a little practice, but it does not need that over-care which prevents one from doing it in a vigorous, direct way.

The freshly laundered linen ought to be as beautiful as one just finished. It should not be folded, but should be rolled on a tube, which may be made of a piece of stiff paper or cardboard.—Harper's Bazar.

Notes of the World's Progress

ONE EXCITING CLIMAX IN THE Dreyfus trial was the cowardly shooting early Monday morning of M. Labori, counsel for the prisoner.

At the opening session of the week General Mercier was confronted by ex-President Casimir-Perier, and the shooting of Labori undoubtedly relieved the ex-minister of war from a predicament. It is conceded that the crucial period is approaching, which may determine the destiny of France. As the trial progresses the tension increases. The country being divided into two opposing factions, there is grave probability that the defeated side will not calmly accept the result. Already in Paris a situation has developed where a spark might ignite a conflagration. Jules Guérin, President of the Anti-Semitic League, and Max Régis, a notorious Jew-baiter, are at this writing, with several companions, besieged at the home of Guérin. On the issuance of warrants charging them with conspiracy against the government, the men sought safety, and as the house is well protected, and the inmates heavily armed and well provisioned, they are able to defy the authorities. The arrest of Paul Deroulede, founder of the League of Patriots, has inflamed partisan sentiment. Deroulede will be tried for treason before the High Court, a tribunal that has not been evoked since the days of Boulanger.

WHILE OUR ARMY IN THE PHILIPPINES is fighting disease and Tagals, the War Department at Washington is trying to get itself straightened out and determine the status of several red-taped branches. Secretary Root is evidently determined that the prosecution of the war is the main thing in hand, and vexed questions as to precedence, superiority, etc., while perhaps of importance in themselves, are secondary. One branch of the service, the inspection department, is, to use the words of Assistant Secretary Meiklejohn, "to have restored certain duties which, through the exigencies of war had gradually devolved on other departments, or been suspended altogether." The withdrawal of powers of the Inspector General by the late Secretary of War was undoubtedly responsible for a great deal of suffering, and one of his last official acts was to restore the inspection department to its former standing. The restoring order, however, contains a provision which prevents the commanding general from exercising supervision.

SECRETARY ROOT PROPOSES TO recognize General Miles, who, during the incumbency of Secretary Alger, occupied a paradoxical position. It is not probable General Miles will be sent to the Philippines, as his counsel and advice will be of greater value in the department. It is probable that some changes may be made, and although General Otis will not be superseded, he will likely be given the assistance of generals who will be able to assume more active control of actual operations than the diversified duties of General Otis permit him to do. If department plans are successfully carried into execution, the early fall will mark the commencement of a quick and effective campaign.

A DISASTROUS STORM, BRINGING death to hundreds in Puerto Rico, has brought a realization that the inhabitants of the island are not merely entitled to sympathy as fellow human beings, but as wards of the government. Telegrams from the authorities in Puerto Rico, giving details of the disaster and destitution which will inevitably follow, met with prompt response, and ship loads of provisions were dispatched as soon as cargoes could be taken aboard. As crops are destroyed, and some villages entirely swept away, it is probable that thousands of unfortunates must depend entirely upon the generosity of the United States for subsistence for some time to come.

ANNOUCEMENT HAS BEEN LATELY made of a discovery in metallurgy, which if verified appears very important and almost revolutionary in its effects. Theodore Olan, a Swedish chemist in Washington, claims to have produced a new combination which, while it is not properly a solvent of metals, has yet the property of changing their molecular condition, so that gold, silver, steel, and other metals, on being immersed in the new liquid, will become soft and pliable. He has named the liquid tauric acid, since it is produced from tauric moss, a lichen of very wide distribution, and growing abundantly. Such a discovery, enabling the artisan to treat and mould refractory metals without the application of heat, is of a character largely to affect many industries. The process of producing is so simple, and its effects so amazing, that one is tempted to consider the announcement as a production of that genius who periodically tells us of the worm that eats the rails on the sleepers of our railways. But this story seems quite respectably vouched for.

GERMANY HAS UNDER CONSIDERATION plans for the reorganization of its consular service, with a view to increased effectiveness on the part of its consuls in the race for commercial supremacy. The propositions are: First, to strengthen the consulates by the assignment of commercial attaches; second, to abolish permanent consuls and appoint experienced merchants in their stead, who will give to the office a commercial character, leaving legal and official duties to be performed by attaches. Whichever plan is adopted, the basis of the consular service will be a corps of consular pupils, to be selected by competitive examination, and thoroughly educated in directions having an important bearing on the duties they will be required to perform. The consular service thus organized would open promising careers to young men. The United States might well adopt a similar plan.

THE CENSUS BUREAU, AT THE REQUEST of the War Department, is preparing to take the Cuban census, and from information thus obtained, Congress can prepare a plan for a Cuban election which will fairly represent the people of the island. It is not expected that the census can be made complete, but from it the population of each province can be determined, also agricultural conditions, and the condition of schools. The voting population having been fixed, election tests can be made which will insure fairness. An endeavor will be made to determine the illiteracy of the people, but this will be a hard matter. Educational tests should properly be made, but as there is not sufficient time for this, the word of the people must be taken. It is urged by influential Cubans that an educational test to decide the right to suffrage would not be just, as in this event suffrage would not be universal.

STREET CAR STRIKERS IN CLEVELAND continue to foment disturbance. In spite of the fact that the street railway company is operating nearly the full number of cars, there are comparatively few people on certain lines who venture to incur the ill-will of strikers and sympathizers by patronizing them. Then, too, is the fear of being dynamited which deters passengers from patronizing any means of locomotion not operated under the auspices of the striking men. Not in the history of strikes has the weapon of boycott been carried to such an extent. It has in fact affected trade so seriously that merchants are devising measures for their own protection. It has reached a point when the merchant who ventures to sell goods to a patron of the street railway company runs the risk of losing the patronage of those who sympathize with the strikers. Whatever grievance the latter may have, and no matter how just, their cause will not be helped by resorting to violence; on the contrary the pastime of dynamiting cars, and perhaps killing occupants, places them on the common criminal level.

THE FIRST ARREST OF "FAITH healers" under the new Illinois law, took place last week, and it is expected the cases will be carried to the highest court, in order that the constitutionality of the law may be tested. Two "healers," graduates of "Zion," the large establishment founded and carried on by John Alexander Dowie, were arrested on two charges, practicing without a license, and mal-practice. The treatment of a woman proved to be ineffective, and when a physician was finally called in, the case had passed beyond human aid. Mr. Dowie and his adherents will contest the case bitterly, and as means are not lacking, a hard legal battle may be looked for, particularly as the life of "Zion" is threatened. The latter is a large institution, formerly a hotel, with accommodations for a great many patients. A printing establishment is maintained in connection.

The News of the Church

New York

Henry Codman Potter, D.D., LL.D., Bishop

Work is being pushed on the new parish house of Christ church, Tarrytown, and it is expected the building will be ready for use within a month.

The safe return of the Rev. George F. Nelson, D.D., the Bishop's secretary, from his trip to Alaska, is announced, which will ensure his prompt resumption of duties.

The summer services at the church of the Holy Apostles are in the charge of the Rev. Wm. D. Williams during the absence of the rector, the Rev. Brady E. Backus, D.D.

At Calvary-parish, the Rev. J. Lewis Parks, D.D., rector, a new curate has been added to the clergy staff, the Rev. Wm. J. Wright, late rector of the church of the Good Samaritan, Colfax, Wash.

While the Rev. Wm. H. Pott, Ph.D., vicar of St. Thomas chapel, is absent attending to the fresh air work of St. Thomas' parish, the summer services of the chapel are in charge of the Rev. R. W. Cochrane.

The Church Club

Is keeping its rooms open all summer for the use of members obliged to remain in town. The privileges have been extended to the clergy.

New Rector for Christ Church

The vestry of Christ church, Sparkill, has chosen the Rev. Arthur H. Proffitt to the vacant rectorship, and he has signified his acceptance.

Honors for a Rector

The rector at New Rochelle, the Rev. Charles F. Canedy, who was recently appointed a commissioner of education by the mayor of that town, has been elected president of the Board of Education by his fellow-commissioners. He and Mrs. Canedy and son departed Aug. 10th for New Hampshire for a few weeks' stay.

Actors' Alliance Outing

The new Actors' Church Alliance has just taken its first excursion, selecting to go to Governor's Island. They were welcomed by the Rev. Edward H. C. Goodwin, vicar of St. Cornelius' chapel, of Trinity parish, who has religious care of the island. Another social outing will be held in September, and also one in October. During the winter a special religious service will be arranged each month.

Temporary Church Home

Bishop Potter has made a timely offer to the church of the Archangel for the use, during the month of August, of the crypt of the cathedral of St. John the Divine. The congregation has of late been worshipping at the residence of the rector, the Rev. Geo. S. Pratt, pending the securing of lots and a new building, towards which, as already announced in the columns of THE LIVING CHURCH, $10,000 has been secured.

Ozi William Whitaker, D.D., LL.D., Bishop

Trinity church, Southwark, Philadelphia, the Rev. Horace F. Fuller, rector, is being thoroughly renovated and frescoed. The services meanwhile are being held in the chapel adjoining.

Holy Trinity, Lansdale

Is an organized mission of the diocese, and is now under the pastoral care of the Rev. Samuel Ward. The encumbrance of $650 on the church edifice having been liquidated, one of the first functions that Bishop Whitaker will perform on his return from Europe will be its consecration.

Death of the Rev. Dr. Benjamin Watson

Word was received in Philadelphia on Wednesday evening, 9th inst., that the venerable Rev. Benjamin Watson, D.D., had entered into rest eternal a few hours previous, at Bay Head, N. J., in the 84th year of his age. He had been in failing health for more than a year, and went to the seashore about the middle of July. Dr. Watson was born in Philadelphia, was educated at Trinity College, Hartford, where he graduated, subsequently entering the General Theological seminary, New York, where he pursued his studies for the ministry. He was ordered deacon in 1841, and two years later was advanced to the priesthood by Bishop Henry U. Onderdonk, of Pennsylvania. He served his diaconate at Grace church, Philadelphia, as rector's assistant. His first rectorship was at Trinity Church, Newport, R. I., and after several years he became rector of St. Luke's, Rochester, N. Y. In 1859 he returned to his native city, and assumed charge of the church of the Atonement, which he served as rector for 35 years, when he resigned, on account of advanced years, and was made rector emeritus. Beside his collegiate degrees, he was honored by the University of Chicago with that of D. D. Although living a retired life for the past five years, Dr. Watson took a great interest in Church affairs. In 1870 he became a member of the Standing Committee of the diocese, and since 1890 was its president. For many years he was dean of the Northwest Convocation, and also one of the managers of the Episcopal Hospital. The funeral service was held in Holy Trinity church, on the 12th inst., and was in charge of the Rev. Dr. J. D. Newlin, representing the Standing Committee; the Rev. Dr. J. N. Blanchard, rector of St. James', of which Dr. Watson's family are parishioners, and the Rev. Dr. Fleming James, of the divinity school, a near friend of the deceased. Representatives of the institutions with which Dr. Watson was connected acted as honorary pallbearers. The remains were interred at Laurel Hill cemetery.

Connecticut

Chauncey B. Brewster, D.D., Bishop

The Holy Communion was celebrated on St. James' Day in Harwinton, being the first held in that church for more than a score of years.

The people of St. Peter's church, Hebron, have recently presented a fine Service Book for use on the altar, and contemplate the early improvement of the church edifice.

Archdeacon Peck has prepared a map of the New London archdeaconry, which, in addition to the parishes and former missionary stations, also shows the towns recently given over by convention to the care of this archdeaconry.

Trinity Church, Torrington

At a vestry meeting recently held, it was voted to present the chancel window of the old church to St. Andrew's mission, New Haven, and to lend the font and sanctuary chairs to Christ church, Harwinton. St. Andrew's mission is at present accomplishing a valuable work, under the energetic charge of the lay evangelist, Colonel J. A. Stansfield, of the Church Army.

Litchfield Archdeaconry

The annual business meeting of the Litchfield archdeaconry was held in Christ church, Watertown, on the 18th and 19th of July. The business and literary meetings and the Wednesday celebration of the Holy Communion were at Watertown, and the Tuesday evening service at Oakville. For several years the rector of Christ church, the Rev. Mr. Cunningham, has maintained services in Oakville, and during the past year has secured an energetic assistant, the Rev. Edwin Skagen, who has taken up his residence in Oakville, and who also has charge of Christ church, Bethlehem.

The Rev. F. W. Barnett Resigns

The Rev. F. W. Barnett, for the past 17 years rector of Christ church, Canaan, has resigned, and entered upon the rectorate of the parish at South Glastonbury. During these years the parish has grown in every way. The stone church, built in 1850, has been improved and adorned in many ways. A commodious rectory has been built on one of the best streets. An endowment fund has been commenced. All this is but the outward side of the loving, devoted service of a faithful parish priest.

Death of Rollin C. Newton

The parish at Canaan met with an additional loss in the death of its junior warden, Mr. Rollin C. Newton. His genial manners endeared him to all, and his Christian character made him a living witness to "the faith as it is in Jesus."

Beautiful Font Destroyed

The church of the Good Shepherd, Hartford, suffered a serious loss recently in the destruction of a beautiful marble font. Its great weight caused the insufficiently supported floor to give way, and the font was precipitated into the basement of the building. The font was a memorial of the three children of Mrs. Samuel Colt, and was the gift of her sister, Mrs. Nichols Beach.

Long Island

Abram N. Littlejohn, D.D., LL.D., Bishop
Corner-Stone Laid

The corner-stone of St. John's chapel, Murray Hill, Flushing, was laid on August 6th. The ceremonies were conducted by the Rev. H. D. Waller, rector of St. George's church, and the vested choir took part in the service. There were placed in the corner-stone, a complete list of the officers and members of St. George's church and Brotherhood, and copies of the Brooklyn Daily Eagle, and local papers. The Brotherhood is contemplating the early erection of another mission chapel, at Black Stump, on land donated near the line of the trolley extension. Funds will be solicited from persons interested in that section, and the work is expected to be soon consummated.

Given a Loving Cup

The Rev. J. A. Denniston, rector of the church of the Ascension, Greenpoint, was recently presented by the vestry and the Woman's Guild of the church with a handsome silver loving cup and fountain pen. The presentation took place on the third anniversary of his rectorship.

Iowa

Theodore Nevill Morrison, D.D., Bishop
Visitation at Washington

The Bishop made his visitation to Trinity church, Washington, on Thursday last, accompanied by the Rev. A. E. Wells, of Traverse City, Mich., and the Rev. W. Parry-Thomas, rector of Muscatine. Service was held at 7:30. A good and attentive congregation listened to an earnest discourse from the Bishop. At its close, a meeting was held to consider the future of the parish. Promises were made which no doubt will lead to good results. In the meantime, weekly services will be held by the rector of Muscatine. Wherever the Bishop has visited he has won golden opinions, and the hearts and sympathy of all, in the work he is doing. Priests and people are already bound to their Bishop by a strong and affectionate loyalty.

Louisiana

Davis Sessums, D.D., Bishop

The rector of St. Mary's, Franklin, the Rev. H. R. Carson, is doing good work in this field. An increase in the attendance at Sunday school from six to seventy five, is one of the indications of renewed life under his rectorship.

The contractor is still at work on the new St. George's church, New Orleans, and it is expected everything will be completed by the fall. It promises to be a very churchly edifice in both exterior and interior.

The arrival of the family of Mr. J. A. Harral for the summer has infused new life into St. Andrew's mission, Arcola. A choir is being organized, and the Sunday school is being increased. The Rev. Mr. Harris visits Arcola when practicable.

New Rectory at Hammond

It is encouraging to note that ground has been purchased at Hammond on which to build a rectory for Grace church, a beautiful little edifice in which the Cote family have done much devoted work. The Rev. Mr. Harris has charge of Hammond, in connection with some other stations on the line of the Illinois Central.

Western New York

Wm. D. Walker, D.D., LL.D., Bishop

Deaf Mute Association

On the morning of August 10th, at Buffalo, the Rev. A. W. Mann opened the 18th convention of the Empire State Deaf Mute Association with prayer. The Rev. C. Orvis Dantzer, General Missionary in the dioceses of Central and Western New York, was secretary of this convention. Over two hundred members from all over the State attended service in the evening at St. Paul's church, the Rev. Dr. Register reading, with Mr. Dantzer as interpreter. The subject of Mr. Mann's sermon was, "What God hath done for us during this century." It showed that no schools for deaf-mutes existed in the United States less than a hundred years ago; now there are over 100, and the methods of instruction have greatly advanced all the while. Church work among the graduates was inaugurated within this century, and has reached every diocese.

Milwaukee

Isaac Lea Nicholson, D.D., Bishop

The Rev. W. H. H. Ross is temporarily serving at St. Mark's, South Milwaukee, during the illness of the rector, the Rev. G. Shelton.

St. Andrew's, Milwaukee, the Rev. G. F. Burroughs, curate, has paid in over $200 toward its building debt during the past three months.

The Rev. Rudolph Stahley, of Prairie du Chien, has been placed in charge of Emmanuel church, Lancaster, in addition to his present duties.

The Rev. John Brann, of St. Matthias', Waukesha, after a year's temporary work in that parish, has been called to the permanent rectorship, from August 1st.

St. James', West Bend, has made another payment of $60 on its building debt, reducing it to $240, from $600 of three years ago. The Rev. W. J. Webster is curate.

St. Peter's, North Greenfield, the Rev. Canon Richey in charge, has paid the entire balance of its $400 debt. It is now wholly free, and some needed improvements on the Church property are at once contemplated.

The Mission at Spooner

Closed for several years, has been re-opened by the zealous efforts of the Rev. Dr. Trimble, of Shell Lake. Eight were confirmed by the Bishop at a recent visitation. The Church owns land, but no building, the services being for the present held in the Methodist building.

New Curate for North Milwaukee

At the church of the Nativity, North Milwaukee, the balance of the debt on the new guild hall has been fully paid. The Rev. John C. Jetter, of St. Thomas', Milwaukee, has been appointed curate-in charge, and will at once begin anew regular Sunday services.

A Handsome Memorial

A new and exceedingly beautiful altar, in white marble, has recently been placed in the church of St. John Baptist, Elkhorn. It was made by Geissler & Co., of New York city, and is a gift in loving memory of the late Wm. Thos. Jones, of Elkhorn, long time a benefactor of the parish, given by his widow. The reredos is in oak, heavily carved, also a memorial of their two children. Two stained glass windows have also been placed in the sanctuary, one on either side of the altar, by Mr. Isaac Moorhouse, in memory of his two sons.

Recent Confirmations

Within the diocese: Number last reported, 577. Baraboo, 13; Mazomanie, 8; Darlington, 6; Nashotah, 5; Star Prairie, 2; Wagon Landing, 8. Total, 614.

Maryland

William Faret, D.D., LL.D., Bishop

Extensive improvements are being made to the Church Home and Infirmary, Baltimore, at a cost of $3 000. When completed, the first three stories of the old building, which were erected about 65 years ago, will be fitted up with all modern conveniences.

The Rev. Joseph P. McComas has been elected to succeed the late Rev. Dr. W. S. Southgate, D.D., as rector of St. Anne's parish, Annapolis. Mr. McComas has for four years since his ordination served as curate of St. Anne's. Mr. McComas and Miss Katharine Murray, daughter of Pay Director Murray, will shortly be married.

The Committee of Missions

Met recently at the Episcopal residence, Baltimore, the most interesting business being the arrangement of several appropriations from the income for the current year from the Keel Fund, which the diocesan convention turned over for a second time to be administered by the committee of missions. The sum of $400 was set aside for the second year's stipend of the Rev. Oliver J. Whildin, the diocesan missionary to deaf-mutes; $500 was devoted to the building and furnishing of a little chapel at Indian Spring, in Washington Co., to be under the charge of the Rev. Jabez C. Koon, rector of St. Thomas' church, Hancock; $600 was appropriated for the renovating of St. Paul's church, Frederick Co., which is so greatly dilapidated as to be useless in its present condition, and has had to be practically abandoned; and $500 was promised towards the stipend of a priest who will be rector of Western Run parish, Baltimore Co., and will spend the greater part of his energy, under the direction of the Archdeacon of Towson, in the effort to develop new work in the northern part of Baltimore Co.

A Generous Gift

Christ church, the old parish church of Queen Caroline parish, Howard Co., is to be completely renovated, through the liberality of Mrs. Mollie R. McGill Rosenberg. Mrs. Rosenberg recently presented St. John's church, Hagerstown, with a beautiful memorial chancel, and on the occasion of the re-opening of the church, came East from her home, in Galveston, Tex. With a party of her family, she paid a visit to Christ church, which her great-great-grandfather served for 50 years as its first rector. Her interest in the old church prompted her to the very generous gift that she is to make. Christ church is doing a good work under its present rector, the Rev. W. P. Painter. The rector and wife sailed July 29th, for a two months' vacation to England, while the church is closed for repairs.

Corner-stone Laid

The corner-stone of the chapel of the Holy Evangelist, Potomac and Dillion sts., in Canton, Baltimore, was laid July 24th, by the Rev. Thomas Atkinson, acting as archdeacon, who was appointed by the Bishop to conduct the service in his absence. He was assisted in the service by the Rev. Harris Mallinckrodt, rector of the chapel. The building is expected to be ready for occupancy by the first Sunday in October, and when completed, will cost about $12,000. The new edifice is being constructed of brick, terra cotta, and stone. The part now being built consists of the nave and aisles, the tower and chancel being left for a later date. The interior is to be 46 ft. wide and 68 ft. deep, and will accommodate about 360 persons. When the chancel and tower are added, the capacity will be increased to about 600. The body of the chapel will be divided into aisles and nave by five arches 18 ft. high, each carried on massive columns. The roof will be supported on open timber, natural finish. There will be a spacious basement, where the Sunday school and other organizations will meet. The mission is under the patronage of the Bishop. In February, 1874, the Rev. Charles Ritter, acting under the direction of the Bishop, began missionary services in the neighborhood, and organized a congregation, which met for worship in a small room on Elliott st. Shortly afterward, the home of the new charge was moved to a chapel of a German Lutheran congregation, on Chesapeake st. On May 17, 1874, the corner-stone of the chapel, which the one now building is to replace, was laid by the Rev. George Leeds, and on Sunday, October 12th, of the same year, it was ready for occupancy.

Brotherhood of St. Andrew

The bi-monthly meeting of the Baltimore local council of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew was held Aug. 1st, at Trinity church, Towson. An informal reception and tea was held from 5:30 to 7 o'clock, followed by a business meeting and short service. The topic of discussion was, "Opportunity of the Brotherhood man for work in public institutions." Mr. Alexander M. Hadden, of New York, associate secretary of the Brotherhood, was the speaker.

New Church at Ocean City

The Rev. J. Gibson Gantt, rector of St. Paul's by the Sea church, Ocean City, is meeting with much success in his efforts to erect a new building at that place. The old one is on an undesirable lot. Both the building and lot are to be sold, and a large and handsome church will be erected on a site a little above the Plimhimmon Hotel. Mrs. John Floyd Waggaman recently presented Dr. Gantt with two lots, 100 by 150 ft. The following gentlemen are the committee on new church building: Messrs. Robert J. Showell, secretary; L. L. Dirickson, Jr., treasurer, and Edw. M. Scott. During this month, the Rev. Mr. Gantt will hold services at the Plimhimmon Casino.

The rectory of Somerset parish, in the suburbs of Princess Anne, caught fire July 27th, and the building and furniture contained therein were damaged to the extent of $300, which is covered by insurance.

Washington

Henry Yates Satterlee, D.D., LL.D., Bishop

Annual Choir Outing

During the past few weeks, three of the Washington choirs—St. John's, Georgetown, the Ascension, and St. Paul's—have successively enjoyed their summer outing at River Springs, on the beautiful little St. Catherine's Bay. The boys have had a glorious time, and have contributed by their music to the enjoyment of the other guests. The Rev. Frank Barton, rector of St. John's, accompanied his choir, and held services for it. On Sunday evening, Aug. 6th, the rector of the parish in which River Springs is situated, held a special service at the hotel.

Damaged by Storm

During a recent severe wind storm, great damage was done to the fine old trees in Rock Creek churchyard, and the large and handsome Celtic cross, in memory of the great benefactor of the parish who gave its glebe lands, nearly two hundred years ago, was overthrown and broken.

Southern Ohio

Thomas A. Jaggard, D.D., Bishop
Boyd Vincent, D.D., Bishop Coadjutor

Christ Church, Cincinnati

A lot just east of the church has been purchased by the vestry, on which a three-story modern parish house is to be erected. Work on the same will be commenced in a few days. The cost of the whole will be about $20,000.

Editorials and Contributions

IT is often claimed as one of the great glories of Masonry that it is absolutely unyielding in the enforcement of its requirements. To obtain its benefits, its laws must be implicitly obeyed. This rigidity is understood to be a fundamental necessity. Masonry as an institution could not exist without this strictness. Men who are Masons do not appear to be restive under the requirements of its laws, or its ritual. They do not rebel against these as being unreasonable or arbitrary. They accept them with a cheerful alacrity, which is praiseworthy, to say the least. And outsiders are not in the habit of caviling at these principles and practices as burdensome or unreasonable or belittling to the intellect of those who subject themselves to these requirements. Nor is Masonry generally characterized by non-Masons as being intolerant, offensive, or arrogantly exclusive, because its members thus practice what they preach. So much for a merely human institution. How is it with the divine organization?

WE do not want to muzzle intelligence or erect a Chinese wall, but as to opposing error we have no choice if we wish to continue Christ's faithful soldiers and servants. Thereto were we baptized, confirmed, and admitted to the unspeakable and august privilege of the Communion of His Body and Blood. The Church cannot be called illiberal or exclusive when it pronounces upon certain things to be believed, which have been believed from the beginning. To call the Church arbitrary or priest-ridden, when it merely follows the original and only source of its illumination, is to say that there may be more than one God, a God for every school of philosophy. It is obvious that with this conception of the case, the Church would naturally melt into nothingness; it would simply expire in the blaze of modern criticism.

IT is very true that the Church has never defined the doctrine of inspiration, and that accordingly, various views have been held and defended by teachers of unimpeachable orthodoxy. But it is not true that there are no limitations upon what may be believed or taught on this subject. When, for instance, we are told that holy men of old spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost, it is undeniable that the intention was to ascribe a unique character to the Old Testament; and when the Church declares that the Holy Scriptures are "the Word of God," it is certainly meant that they are in this way distinguished from all other writings. To confound the inspiration of the Sacred Scriptures with that of the poets and sages of all time, is to reduce Christianity to naturalism. Here, in fact, is the centre of the conflict. Nothing less is involved than the rejection of supernatural religion, as such. This movement began in Germany, a century ago, when the position was taken that the Gospel is nothing more than the republication of natural religion. It was long in making an impression upon the minds of our own people, but of late years, under the impulse of certain applications of the evolution philosophy, and of the "scientific movement," it is making its way with accelerated speed. The worst of it is that by continuing to use old terms in changed senses, under the specious pretence of adding the illumination of modern thought, even the elect are liable to be deceived. The recent free handling of the subject of inspiration is a clear instance of this. It places the Bible in the same category with the records and systems of paganism.

WE are far from agreement with Canon Gore upon some most important subjects, but the following words from his book entitled, "The Clergy and the Creeds," are worthy of all praise:

Oh, let the conscience of men awake! The Christian Creed is a quite distinct and intelligible thing. If its reality is gone, we shall gain nothing and lose everything by retaining its language. We shall gain nothing, for the words become but hollow echoes ringing with a hideous mockery in the ears of those who desire the support of truth; we shall lose everything, because we introduce into the highest part of our life an atmosphere of unreality which will have an influence (depend upon it), on its other departments, undermining everywhere the foundation of reality and truthfulness, and which will appear in grosser form in less academic circles. A society which exists not primarily to seek truth, or to keep society together, or to make men comfortable, but to bear witness to a "once-for-all delivered Faith," and preach a Gospel of specific good tidings given in the Incarnation, Birth, Death, and Resurrection of the Son of God, cannot welcome into its ministry, with any show of reason, men who are content, indeed, to use its language, but only if they may repudiate its meaning.

We are the more glad to reproduce these words, because some of those who propose to "flux the Creed with new meanings" have claimed Canon Gore as on their side.

"What is the Good of Going to Church"

IN the June number of the Ladies' Home Journal is a symposium on the subject of Church-going. The question this time is, "What is the good of going to Church?" It is answered by a number of ministers of prominence in their respective denominations, including an "Episcopal bishop," a Methodist bishop, a Roman priest, a Jewish rabbi, a Presbyterian, a Congregationalist, and a Baptist. The hope is expressed that these answers may meet the case of the "young man" who is doubtful about the utility of going to Church. It cannot be without interest to see what reasons are presented to bring conviction to the mind of such a young man. We confess that, save in one or two instances, we fail to find anything of convincing force. It is disappointing to find a bishop of the Church bringing forward such reasons as these: We go to church "to catch sight of the highest ideals"; the pressure is strong for six days to put up with low or harmful standards. "On the seventh day why not strike into the purer atmosphere of the ideal?" Then, second, "the Church is the nursery of public spirit," so much needed in trade, politics, and society. Third, church-going broadens thought, and brings a man's mind into contact with the greatest characters and the noblest literature. "The worshiper comes forth a larger, humbler, more interesting, and a better man." The fourth and final reason which this representative of the Holy Catholic Church finds himself able to give, is that a man can extend his influence, in the strongest and most enduring way, by throwing in his lot with an institution like the Church. With these four reasons, this speaker rests his case.

WILL the average young man who has "honest doubts" of the efficacy of church-going be induced by such considerations to turn over a new leaf? As to "high ideals," he will consider that they are easy to find when he wants them, without submitting himself to systematic drudgery. And for the development of public spirit, the air is full of all sorts of arguments and appeals on that behalf. The cultivation of good literature is probably the last idea which would occur to the average young man as a reason for going to church in these present days. There are libraries, and there are lectures; books are cheap, and Bibles, in particular, may be had, even without the asking. The young man in question would reasonably urge, that while the Bible and the Prayer Book are doubtless, as literature, all that is claimed for them, it is no longer necessary to go to church in order to become familiar with them. Good literature as they are, their excellence is too often obscured in church by readers who have never learned to read. He may ask, too, whether sermons are necessarily good literature, and what is to be said of hymns? To certain classes of minds the suggestion that "a man who wants to extend his influence into time," would do well to consider the opportunities which connection with the Church afford, is alluring. But we can imagine no suggestion more foreign to that spirit of humility which is the subject of the first beatitude, than that men should be asked to join the Church because their influence is likely to be valuable.

ON the whole, we cannot help feeling that our own spokesman in this symposium has failed to advance a single argument likely to effect the reform of the "young man." The Methodist bishop, in like manner, speaks of relief from nervous tension—which many men, in fact, find in a bicycle ride to the country; of "developing the mind," and "broadening the area of knowledge" of the gospel of the brotherhood of man as "the potent gospel of every Church." We find ourselves wondering what John Wesley would have said to this! Better things are said by some of the others. Dr. McGlynn, the Roman representative, touches the truth when he reminds us that Christ has sent authoritative teachers, and we must come together to hear them; that He has established sacraments—and we must come together to receive them; that the Church is the family of God, and we are bound to discharge our obligations as members of it. The Rabbi Gottheil strikes a true note when he speaks of duty rather than of advantages. Dr. Parkhurst gives his opinion that there is no good in going to Church unless the Church is worth going to. This has a promising sound, and we go with him entirely when he deprecates every kind of catch-penny scheme for filling up a place of worship. He seems to think it will not be necessary to ask the question when the Church becomes "in truth, the very house of God," the temple of His Presence, "a meeting place between God and man." Dr. Bradford, Congregationalist, and Dr. Conwell, Baptist, are the two writers in this list who show the clearest sense of the truth, and express it in the most downright way. In the case of both the whole matter is summed up in this simple statement: "We go to church to worship God."

THE question of church-going can never be settled by any marshaling of minor or incidental advantages. There is not one of these—rest from nervous tension, introduction of higher ideals, enlargement of the mind, literary culture, nourishment of public spirit, even moral reform—which is not provided for in other ways. Even "the brotherhood of man," as many insist, is made a practical thing through the various philanthropic, ethical, and beneficiary associations with which the world is full. And so long as this is the case, and the advantages included under all these heads may be obtained without the uncomfortable pressure of demands upon the conscience and the faith, men will naturally prefer the less exacting path. It is of little permanent avail to appeal to men in the name of religion, on any but the highest motives. The reasons for going to church are at once simple and powerful. We must go in order to worship God. God is a Person, and He demands this of us. Our own nature, moreover, in its deepest instincts impels us to do this. It is needful for the salvation of the immortal soul. When we have faced these considerations, all others, true as they may be in their measure, seem worthless by comparison. Only, if our supposititious "young man of honest doubts" does not believe in God, and does not know whether he himself has a soul, these considerations are, of course, without avail. But in such a case, will any others have more weight?

At His Best

A VESTRYMAN says: "Our rector is an excellent man, a faithful pastor, and a good preacher—at his best, an unusually good preacher, and sometimes really eloquent; we wish he could always be at his best." And this suggests inquiries: How is it as to his parishioners? Are they generally "at their best?" Are they regular in church attendance? Do they join heartily in the services? Are they earnest in parochial work? Well, no, it can't be said that they are, in the congregation referred to. And how is it as to the vestrymen? Are they examples to the flock in these particulars? No, it can't be said that they are. They are not any more constantly at church than the rest of the people. Some of them are, in fact, very irregularly at church. It is a common thing for some of them to be absent for three successive Sundays, though at home and able to attend to their business every day. The rector of the parish has even been known to ask members of the congregation to assist in taking the offerings because there was not a lay officer of the parish present.

And yet a vestryman of this very parish wishes that his rector "could always be at his best." When will a clergyman be at his best? Manifestly, when his people are at their best; when he knows that his "labor is not in vain in the Lord"; when he sees that he is doing good and has reason to think that he is helping and inciting others to faithfulness and godly zeal. It will be said he has nothing to do with results; he is to go on all the same, and in whatever he does, do it heartily as unto the Lord and not unto men. True enough, and yet the clergyman was a man before he was a clergyman, and is still of like passions with other men. It is idle to say that he should never be discouraged. Being human, he cannot help being below "his best" when he sees indifference where he has a right to look for encouragement, and habitual negligence in those from whom he has a right to expect habitual faithfulness.

Surely it is not too much to say that a vestryman of a parish, as well as the rector, ought to be examples to the flock in zeal and constancy in walking in all the commandments and ordinances of the Lord blameless. It is not claiming too much to say that the lay officers of a parish ought to be the most zealous and faithful men in it. In more than an ordinary degree, they are responsible before Almighty God for the souls of those around them. Is it unnatural that a parish priest should feel as if weighted and hampered in his work, when he knows, and his people know, that the lay officers of the parish do not seem to feel any responsibility for the spiritual well-being of the parish? A pastor will be "at his best" when his people also are at their best. They have a right to expect from him consideration, counsel, comfort, and encouragement. And the very same human necessities that lead his people to expect this of him cause him to expect this of them. * * *

Few congregations imagine how much they have to do in developing the highest and best powers of their pastor. Let any parish priest have among his people a considerable number of earnest and devoted parishioners, and he will be sure to be an earnest and devoted man. If not, then the highest is not in him. If you want your rector to be always "at his best," try yourself, in your degree, to be what you would like to have him to be in his.—From the Manual of the Bishop of West Virginia.

The Recent Agitation

FROM St. Chad's Parish Register

IT is recorded in the first history of the Church of God ever written, the Acts of the Apostles, that when the Jewish Council was debating as to what steps they should take utterly to crush and repress the new superstition, there was at least one man who was alive to the fact that the movement that they were endeavoring to repress was one of heart and conscience, and that it could not be put down by forcible measures. And so Gamaliel, one of their most distinguished scholars, gave his counsel thus to his brethren: "I say unto you, refrain from these men, and let them alone, for if this counsel or this work be of men, it will come to nought, but if it be of God, ye cannot overthrow it; lest haply ye be found even to fight against God." Acts v: 38, 39.

We have sometimes wondered how long it would be before this simple truth would be recognized by some of the deeply sincere and conscientious men who have taken part in this present agitation, and when the protestant Gamaliel would arise. He has arisen, it appears, in the person of the editor of The Christian World, and this is what he says:

"Some of the utterances in the address of Lord Halifax to the English Church Union are so significant, so bold and uncompromising, that they have far more than a passing interest.

"The main principle is that the Anglican Church, as only a part of the whole Church, has not, and never had, any right to alter her doctrines and formularies in a sense adverse to the teaching and example of the greater society. Lord Halifax does indeed mention, by way of exception, 'matters within the competence of a national Church to alter.' But the whole tendency of his argument is to confine such a field of Anglican dependence to the very narrowest limits.

"There are those who say: 'We will see about that; pass a more vigorous Church discipline act, and let us see who will dare to defy it!' Such a threat comes very well from those who regard religion as a creature of human law. But we cannot conceive how it can be consistently uttered by those who insist that Jesus disclaimed any kingdom of force. It is all very well to say that the law exists already, and that a new law is wanted only to secure obedience. But the law, so far as it seeks to force conscience, is sacrilegious, and any attempt to add to its terrors is more sacrilegious still. The proper plan is to repeal an impossible law, and let the Anglican Church go free to be as ritualistic as it likes. We have never said, we have never dreamed, that Disestablishment would abolish Ritualism. We only say that it is no part of the nation's duty either to endow Ritualism, or to forbid it. Let it alone. If it has no root in the spiritual life it will perish. If it has, who are we that we should pull it up?"

Ephphatha Sunday

THE Church Mission to Deaf-Mutes, New York, was incorporated in 1872, to promote the welfare of the silent people after they leave school. Its missionaries hold services in the sign language in ten different churches in the dioceses of New York, Long Island, Newark, and Connecticut. Other dioceses are provided for by missionaries, mostly deaf-mutes, acting under various bishops and rectors.

The Church Mission to Deaf-Mutes, New York, is active in the field referred to above, and has brought many into pastoral relations through Baptism, Confirmation, and the Holy Communion.

Deaf-mutes specially need the care and advice which they thus receive from the ministers of the compassionate Saviour who said "Ephphatha" to a deaf and dumb man, and restored him to hearing and speech. The miracle cannot be repeated in our day, but the hearts and minds of the deaf can be opened to the light of the Gospel, and they can be led to cultivate the Christian life.

The society's missionaries are constantly engaged in ministering to the sick and needy. Though the majority of the deaf are getting on well, and supporting themselves and their families, cases of destitution are daily arising, and must be met. Work is found for the unemployed, marriages and burials are performed, the Holy Communion is administered to the sick and dying. Deaf-mutes who find they have made a mistake in coming to our great metropolis for work, are often sent back to their relatives and friends, where they can fight the battle of life more favorably.

The society maintains the Gallaudet Home for Aged and Infirm Deaf-Mutes in the State of New York. This home, free from debt, is beautifully situated on a farm, by the Hudson river, between New Hamburg and Poughkeepsie. It cares for twenty-six afflicted people, both women and men. Three of the inmates are deaf, dumb, and blind.

Thus it can be seen that offerings and gifts are needed for the moderate salaries of five missionaries, the Charity Fund, and the support of the Home for the Aged and Infirm.

The Prayer of Faith

BY JAMES LOUIS SMALL

"Jesus went thence, and departed into the coasts of Tyre and Sidon. And, behold, a woman of Canaan came out of the same coasts, and cried unto Him, saying, Have mercy on me, O Lord, thou son of David; my daughter is grievously vexed with a devil. But he answered her not a word." St. Matthew, xv, 21-23.

TO few of us is it an easy matter to pray, and how still more difficult is the exercise of devotion, when that exercise seems to bring no tangible reply or answering fulfillment. The above quoted portion of St. Matthew's Gospel has to many of even the most earnest of our Saviour's followers proved a stumbling-block. The transition of the Master from His usually mild and gentle demeanor to that of apparent harshness, presents to them a problem inexplicable.

We can imagine the feverish eagerness with which this humble suppliant approached the Divine Presence, nothing doubting that the great Physician would hearken and heal. From a heart full of maternal suffering and anxiety went up the agonized cry: "Have mercy on me, O Lord, thou son of David." What then must have been the disappointment and grief attendant upon the silence of Jesus?

Is it not so with you and me in our daily life? The way seems so rough to our weary feet, and the road is encompassed on every side by so many gloomy shadows. We cry out to our Captain in our loneliness and weakness, but no answer seems to come to our straining ears, and we plod along blindly and helplessly. Perhaps a dear heart's desire, a boon which we crave, has been for days, months, or perchance for years, the subject of unceasing prayer. At last, tired and worn by what we term wasted effort and unrequited supplication, we give up the strife, and lose by faintheartedness and lack of courage, that which God, if so He had willed, might have granted.

Then there are those who would fain have us discontinue our so-called "fruitless pleadings." "Of what use," they say, "are such unavailing prayers—prayers so destitute of fulfillment or reward?" Let us return for our example to the woman of Canaan. There were present those who endeavored to draw her away, but increased resistance seemed but to deepen her zeal, for the Apostle tells us that "she fell down and worshipped Him." Are you and I willing to fall down and worship our Lord when our cries seem unavailing, and only the eye of faith can penetrate the cloud that bars our vision? Are we not rather too prone to seek God for the benefits which we think likely we may obtain from Him, and when those benefits are withheld, selfishly inclined to turn away, nourishing in our hearts thoughts of bitterness instead of blessing?

Then, too, we are here taught that our prayers should above all else be humble. Our Blessed Lord said: "It is not meet to take the children's bread and to cast it to dogs." But unhesitatingly came the reply: "Truth, Lord; yet the dogs eat of the crumbs which fall from their master's table." Are not we apt to assume towards God the attitude of master of the house, rather than servant; much less the humblest of all postures, that of even a lowly beast in His Presence? Referring again to the narrative: After repeated effort and repeated exertion, what a glorious result followed! "Her daughter was made whole from that selfsame hour." If such was the devotion of a woman unlearned and untaught in the mysteries of the faith, how much greater should be the workings of the Holy Spirit in us who have been sealed with the seal of the Living God, and who find refreshment on our earthly pilgrimage in the Esca Viatorum, "the Pilgrim's Bread."

May we ever then remember that the withdrawal from us of God's Face is but a trial, a test of the greatness of our faith in Him, and a means by which we may realize how infinitely sordid and base are the things of earth when compared to the beauty and brightness of His all-abiding Presence.

Letters to the Editor

THE CANONS ON DIVORCE

To the Editor of The Living Church:

I am persuaded that if my brethren, who advocate stringent legislation in the matter of marriage and divorce, come to understand my contention that it is not only unwise but wrong to enact an ecclesiastical law which forbids what both God and the canons of the Church universal allow, they will permit me and perhaps others to act and vote with them. For this reason I ask the use of the columns of THE LIVING CHURCH to republish a letter, which I addressed to the New York Sun, and which appeared in that journal July 26, 1899, and also a proposed canon, which I submit for the consideration of my brethren.

To the Editor of the Sun:—Sir, I am sincerely obliged to the Sun for its kindly editorial notice of my letter to the Churchman on the subject of marriage and divorce, and I now ask the privilege of responding to the Sun's request for information.

My proposed canon would bring before the bishop or presbyter such cases only as had been legally adjudged void ab initio, or from the beginning; and the jurisdiction of the said bishop or priest would go no further than to decide whether the parties, after they had obtained such a decree, were even then suitable subjects for the solemnization of holy matrimony. The marriage is affirmed to be absolutely void, but, notwithstanding, it might be that one or both of the parties might still be unfit to receive the blessing of the Church in the solemnization of holy matrimony. As, for example, if the original alleged marriage was secured by one of the parties passing himself or herself off as an unmarried person. In that case the guilty party would have committed the crime of bigamy, and if he were to enter into a new alliance it would aggravate the crime, and in such a case a clergyman, of course, ought not to officiate.

My position, then, is briefly this:

1. That marriage is indissoluble.
2. That no clergyman of the Church should marry persons who have procured a divorce for any cause arising after marriage.
3. That in cases where the causes existed prior to marriage, the only redress in the eye of the law is for a legal declaration that such marriage is null and void from the outset.
4. Such cases could only come under the jurisdiction of a clergyman when they rested upon such a legal declaration of a civil court; and the extent of such jurisdiction would be only so far as to inquire whether the parties were suitable subjects for holy matrimony, as is now the duty of every clergyman when asked to use the marriage service.

In regard to the case alluded to by the Sun I would say that it has not the slightest bearing upon my canon. The decree of divorce in that instance was based on the ground of desertion, and the statement that the marriage was null and void ab initio was based upon the private consensus of four eminent persons who are alone responsible for their assertion. They doubtless thought they were correct in their assumption, but they were, as subsequent events proved in error as to the facts. My proposed canon would have nothing whatsoever to do with private opinions and declarations. There must be in the first instance a decree of a competent court that the parties were never in reality married, or else the case could not come under the purview of any clergyman so as to allow him to solemnize the marriage. He must have the legal finding of a court or he could not take a single step in the matter.

GEORGE F. SEYMOUR,

Bishop of Springfield.

Springfield, Ill., July 22, 1899.

PROPOSED CANON

§ 1. No minister of this Church shall solemnize the marriage of any person, who has a divorced husband or wife still living, if such husband or wife has been put away for any cause arising after marriage. And in all cases where the marriage is alleged to be null and void ab initio, such fact must be proved by the decree of a competent civil court, before the clergyman may officiate.

But this canon shall not be held to apply to parties once divorced seeking to be united again, and in all such cases the officiating minister shall use only so much of the marriage service, as shall satisfy the legal requirements as to the proclamation that the parties are in the eyes of the law man and wife, and invoke upon them the nuptial benediction.

§ 2. Questions touching the facts of any case arising under section 1 of this canon, after the decree of the civil court has been secured and exhibited, shall be referred to the bishop of the diocese, or missionary jurisdiction in which the same may occur; or if there be no bishop of such diocese or missionary jurisdiction, then to some bishop to be designated by the standing committee; and the bishop to whom such questions have been so referred shall thereupon make inquiry in such manner, as he shall deem expedient, and shall deliver his judgment in the premises in writing."

I would simply add in conclusion that in my experience there have come before me three cases, where the alleged marriage was no marriage, two were procured by fraud, and one by coercion. I have recently heard of a case, where in ignorance brother and sister were united in marriage.

GEORGE F. SEYMOUR.

Springfield, Ill., Aug. 8, 1899.

OUR DEFECTIVE CANONS

To the Editor of The Living Church:

Your editorial on the enforcement of canonical requirements in the case of persons applying for Holy Orders, is very much ad rem, and there is nothing concerning which the conscience and the intelligence of the Church more urgently need awakening. But a large part of the present evil resides in the present condition of the canons, which practically provide between seventy and eighty different standards for admission to the ministry. That is to say, in every individual bishop there is vested so large a discretion in the way of dispensations (a) of time, and (b) of scholastic requirements, as to make it extremely easy to open the gates to a large influx of uneducated men. Add to this the fact that a candidate for Holy Orders, having failed to pass his examinations in one diocese, may, on one pretext or another, be transferred to another diocese, where it is known that the standards are lower and the requirements less rigid, and you have a situation full of the gravest mischief.

For its consequences are not only intellectual, they are moral. The vagrant minister, or he of unsavory record or doubtful soundness in the faith, is tempted by such a condition of things to turn from other communions to the Church, as a short cut to the honors and emoluments of a calling for which, it may be, he is doubly disqualified.

There is but one remedy for such a state of things, and that is the West Point rule. No man gets a commission in the regular army because he has passed an examination in Alaska or New Hampshire. There is one board, with one set of examiners, and one set of standards. Ours should be like it. The examiners should be elected, from tried and competent men, of universally recognized capability, by the General Convention. Their expenses should be assessed upon the dioceses, and their rejections should be final. All the inconvenience, the pecuniary expenditure, the delays that such a method would cost, would be repaid by the selection of men who, like the graduates of our military academy, have won their rank by sheer merit, and whose diplomas have been given them "without fear, favor, or affection."

New York, August 7, 1899. H. C. POTTER.

NOT BLACK, BUT WHITE

To the Editor of The Living Church:

A few years ago, a writer describing a visit of some Sioux Indians, from the Cannon Ball, N.D., to Bishop Walker, stated that the Sioux called him "Chief of the Black Robes."

This was not true to fact. The Indians have given names to the several bodies working among them, and it so happens that they never speak of our bishop and clergy as Black Robes, but White Robes.

In a recent number of The Spirit of Missions, and also in THE LIVING CHURCH of Aug. 5th, is an interesting letter from the Ojibways, by Mrs.

Morrison, wife of the Bishop of Duluth, in which she says they call her husband the "Great Black Robe." I am not conversant with the Ojibway language, but am of the opinion that they too would call him Chief White Robe. I would like Brother Giffillan to express his opinion on this. My experience of over twenty-five years is that the term "Black Robes" is invariably given to that body known as Jesuits, and also includes the Roman Catholic Church. On the other hand, the Indian sees the Bishop and missionaries ministering in their white robes, so that the name White Robes is true to fact as well as appropriate. My object in writing this is not to criticise, but merely to draw attention to the fact that we are not, in the Indian mind, Black Robes or Jesuits, but White Robes; and this describes the Church in her claims, white or pure in her faith and doctrine.

E. ASHLEY,
Missionary to the Sioux Indians.

REASONS FOR DECLINE OF PRESBYTERIANISM

To the Editor of The Living Church:

New York city is just now agitated over strikes, but the secular and religious papers find time to discuss the "decline of Presbyterianism" in that city. I am not interested in the various reasons assigned for this "decline of faith in the pulpit and the pews," further than to note these significant words of a Presbyterian doctor of divinity: "Let us, like the Episcopalians, make the services of the grand old Presbyterian Church more ornate and beautiful, more attractive, so that they will appeal to the æsthetic tastes of the people. Then there will be a marked increase in interest in all lines of Christian activity." And yet, forsooth, it is not so long ago that the "interest in all lines of Christian activity" was to be promoted by banishing all forms and ceremonies. One writer in the controversy still holds the trouble to be "a decided departure from the simplicity of our ancestors, and a growing imitation of Prelatists and Catholics." The dispute rages, and Presbyterianism is being shaken up, and in the house of its friends, by its friends.

THANKS FROM Y. M. C. A.

To the Editor of The Living Church:

In behalf of the army and navy department of the Young Men's Christian Association, I write to thank you most sincerely for your contribution of your paper, THE LIVING CHURCH, which is received regularly and forwarded to our representatives at Manila, and, with other papers, is distributed among the troops at that point.

H. J. McCox, Gen'l Secy.

A PERPLEXED PRIEST

To the Editor of The Living Church:

Will you kindly reply to the following questions?

(1) A priest who regards the Holy Communion as the chief act of Christian worship, but who is without an assistant, celebrates twice every Sunday, at 7:30 and 11 A. M. Is he justified in so doing? If so, on what grounds?

(2) Where in the Holy Communion Office is it proper to introduce a special prayer, say the prayer for a sick person? Is there any special place?

[(1) Catholic usage fully justifies the second Celebration, where necessity exists, as may be assumed under the circumstances instanced. (2) In the absence of any rubric, it is quite customary to introduce special prayers just before the final blessing.—Ed.]

"Right dear in the sight of the Lord is the death of His saints."

Appeals

(Legal title [for use in making wills]: THE DOMESTIC AND FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY OF THE PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH IN THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.)

Domestic missions in seventeen missionary districts and forty-one home dioceses: missions among the colored people; missions among the Indians; foreign missions in China, Japan, Africa, Greece, and Haiti; support of the clergyman of this Church appointed to counsel and guide the presbyters and readers in Mexico.

Provision must be made for the salaries and traveling expenses of twenty-four bishops, and stipends of 1,700 missionary workers, besides the support of schools, orphanages, and hospitals. Contributions are, moreover, asked specifically for the salaries of workers and support of schools in Mexico. One thousand dollars per month is the estimate of such expenses.

Remittances should be made to MR. GEORGE C. THOMAS, treasurer, 281 Fourth ave., New York. At present, please address communications to the REV. JOSHUA KIMBER, associate secretary.

Spirit of Missions, official monthly magazine, $1 a year.

TO ALL WHOM IT MAY CONCERN: I beg to make the following appeal in behalf of the missionary station over which I have charge and for my personal effects. During the past months the heathens adjacent to our station have committed great and many depredations, by robbing the station of clothes, cloths, books, and school utensils, together with our own personal effects, after which they burned all the lumber, both the mission's and mine, with the remaining articles. Nothing, therefore, is left us but the clothes which we now wear. The provisions were dug up, fruit and coffee trees were cut down and burned. Our once flourishing cultivated mission station is at present reduced to a waste. You will see then, dear friends, the necessity of the appeal, for we are in most distressing need for food, clothing, and shelter. "May God arouse your sympathizing hearts towards your distressed brethren."

J. A. K. RUSSELL

Cape Palmas, June 14, 1899.

THE Church Deaconess Home and Training School, at St. Paul, Minn., has completed a successful year, and increased its sphere of usefulness. It combines a training school with a home for its graduates, and a variety of benevolent undertakings. It sustains a free Church kindergarten and school, numbering seventy pupils, does district nursing, relief work, and a large amount of parish visiting. It offers to its graduates who are found faithful, a home for life. It is the intention to make it a complete Deaconess Institute and Mother House. During the past year, six single rooms have been added, four of which have been applied for. Lectures begin the first Tuesday in October, and continue until the end of May, with short vacation at Christmas and Easter. The instruction is entirely free, but students who live in the home are expected to pay fifteen dollars a month for board. Worthy persons who need assistance in taking the course of studies, can sometimes secure it through their bishop. There is no work more genuinely missionary in its character than the finding of the waifs and strays of our city population, and training them in the fundamentals of religion. The Church needs an order of consecrated teachers as well as nurses and visitors. Is there not as complete consecration among the women of our Church as is found in other branches? It must be confessed that the deaconess cause languishes both for workers and the means of support. Both of these, however, will be supplied as the deaconess becomes better known.

THE third annual Retreat for priests and seminarians will be held in St. Peter's church, Westchester, New York city, beginning Monday evening, Sept. 18, 1899, with Evensong at 7:30, and concluding with celebration of the Holy Eucharist at 7 A. M., Friday, Sept. 22d. The expense for board and lodging for the period of the Retreat will be $5. The conductor will be the Rev. J. O. S. Huntington, Superior O. H. C. The reverend clergy who expect to attend, will kindly send their names to the Rev. R. R. UPJOHN, committee, 296 Clinton st., Brooklyn, N. Y. City.

NEXT Ephphatha Sunday (Aug. 20th) rapidly approaches, with the usual reminder to parishes within the limits of the Mid-Western Deaf-Mute Mission that offerings are needed to meet its expenses.

THE REV. A. W. MANN,
General Missionary, Gambier, Ohio.

TWELFTH SUNDAY AFTER TRINITY, AUG 20TH

The Church Mission to Deaf-Mutes, New York, appeals for special offerings from churches, and gifts from individuals, on this appropriate day.

"Very Members Incorporate"

Golden links of soul to soul,
 As the pilgrim-years swift roll,
 Welded under earthly skies
 For the halls of Paradise;
 There a chain as diamonds bright
 In the day that knows no night.

In the Body Mystical,
 Living, tolling partners all;
 At the altar's vestibule
 Learners in the heavenly school:
 Children at the Father's feast—
 Welcome all—aye, e'en the least!

Midnight pilgrims, starward led To the Manger's humble bed;
 Then upon Temptation's hill,
 Down to Kedron's opened rill;
 There beside the Victim's Tree,
 Faithful in His agony.

Then at early morn the Tomb,
 Radiant o'er the night of gloom:
 And at His Ascension's sight,
 Peering into worlds of light;
 In His Pentecostal morn,
 As one speech, one race new-born.
 They who round His throne behold
 One unbroken chain of gold,
 They who in this low vale wait,
 All in Him incorporate!

IN one of the seaside towns on the Devonshire coast an association has been formed called the "Brothers of Pity." It is modeled after a similar association in some of the Italian cities, and is for the purpose of rendering aid to the sick, and affording reverent ministrations to the dead. The members are liable to be called upon for these services at any time. Sometimes it is to keep watch over a delirious or dangerous patient, sometimes to carry out the dead from the hospital, and with careful hands perform the last offices, and sometimes it is to bury those who have no friends. Everything is carried out very simply and unobtrusively, and no one but the members know who they all are. The organization was brought about by the priest-in-charge of the parish, and on the first night twenty-four fishermen enrolled themselves as members. They recruit their ranks by a simple invitation to any man likely to join them. The men seem to have taken to this work very heartily, and are glad to be of use.

A SUBSCRIBER, commenting very kindly on the good work which has been done by THE LIVING CHURCH, says: "It has given me pain to see the paper diminishing in size, from time to time, while the price was increasing." The change noted was in the page form. This has been changed twice, being made smaller each time, but the paper has, with each change, really been made larger. The size of the paper depends upon the number of pages, as well as the size of the page. It seems best to correct the misconception above noted, as it may be entertained by others. The annual "output" of THE LIVING CHURCH is greater now than ever before.

ANOTHER correspondent suggests that a space should not be devoted to secular matters in a Church paper, and expresses regret that THE LIVING CHURCH is following the tendency of the religious press in this direction. He says: "I think the same objection applies here, as to the clergy who preach politics, science, or business. The laity know a good deal more about such matters than the clergy do." The latter proposition may be open to question, unless it be largely qualified. The parallel assumed between the Church weekly family paper and the pulpit, is altogether inadmissible. The religious journal may, to some extent, be an auxiliary of the pulpit, but it makes no claim, and has no commission, to take the place of the preacher and pastor. Any topic which is of interest to the Christian family is suitable for discussion in its columns. It may fairly have for its scope the whole world of life, thought, and action, from a Christian point of view. Its mission is to interest and influence many kinds of readers, of various ages and conditions; some will value one feature and some another; perhaps no one will care for everything in any issue of the paper. How much of the secular paper does any one read? Very little; yet every item is of interest to some readers. Suggestions are always welcome, and are carefully considered.

Pen-and-Ink-lings

DR. HILLIS, discoursing in The Ladies' Home Journal, on "The secret of a happy life," devotes an entire article to pain and sorrow! And he is right. The worldling, the sensualist, the agnostic can have no conception of a happy life except by the avoidance of trouble. The Christian philosopher sees that real happiness comes only by the acceptance and patient endurance of it. "Troubles are appointed," he says, "to refine away our grossness; to transmute selfishness into self-sacrifice; to destroy vice; to transfigure all our life. Refused, troubles bruise without softening; crush without maturing. Accepted and rightly used, they change their nature and become joys. Tears are seeds; planted, they blossom into joy and gladness."

ANOTHER passage among many worth quoting, is this: "Culture and character come through suffering. Life is God's university; happiness is the graduating point, but trouble and adversity are among the chosen teachers. The world is built for joy, but man comes to his full estate through the tutelage of sorrow. If man washes his eyes in tears and makes his garments white with blood, he, too, is promised the throne and sceptre of the higher manhood."

MR. BROWER, in his "Travel Notes," International for June, strongly commends the new rule on ocean liners which forbids officers of the ship from social intercourse with the passengers. It is a good rule, and should have been enforced long ago. Some of the best officers on the Atlantic have made it a rule for themselves these many years. We never feel safe on a vessel where the captain seems to be "having a good time."

VACATION never comes to the Editor's Table, though one or other of the staff may be off for an outing. Some are always "digging" in the ink-well, a well in which there seems to be no bottom. Fifty-two times a year, with inexorable regularity, the pen-and-ink-lings of one kind and another must be forthcoming; if not wise, then otherwise. The moral is not far to seek: Be not over critical in hot weather. As Widow Bedott says, we are all poor critters; especially when the mercury forgets to retire even at midnight. Avaunt, thou wing-footed Mercury! Wilt thou stay up all night?

CAPTIOUS critics from old seacoast cities, where there is little to be done except to keep clean, declare that the streets of Chicago are dirty! What would they? Shall we stop growing that we may sweep our streets? Nay, but how can we clean them? In wet weather the ooze is too thin to be handled, and in windy weather the dust is mostly in the air. It is the case of the Arkansas man whose roof needed mending—in the rain he could not mend it, and in fair weather he did not need to mend it. People should provide themselves with respirators, if they would not breath filthy dust. Let us have an automobile respirator; then, "blow wind, come wrack," at least we may live long enough to see the city council cleansed.

THIS queer advertisement is clipped from a Chicago paper: "Situation wanted—Energetic theological student of liberal views, but having an inherently keen sense of veracity, wants employment, local or to travel. Address —, Times-Herald."

SCOTCH reverence for the late Mr. Gladstone is displayed in this conversation between two Scotchmen, reported by the British Weekly. One of them said, with much emphasis: "There hasna been a law-giver equal to Mr. Gladstone since the day o' Moses." "Moses!" retorted the other, "Moses got the law gien tae him frae the Lord, but Mr. Gladstone makes laws oot o' his ain heed."

REPORTERS are funny fellows! One who wrote up the opening of the General Convention in Washington, must have smiled as he pictured Bishop Whipple in the procession, "the senior Presiding Bishop present, his tall, patriarchal form clad in a crimson Oxford hood, and his white hair surmounted by a purple biretta." It reminds one of a summer costume said to be once popular in a certain locality, consisting of a collar and a pair of spurs!

GOOD old Dr. Morsell—may his soul rest in peace—was for many years rector of the parish of Smyrna, Del. It was in the days when tramping was first becoming a legitimate occupation (?), and the presumption was still that the man asking for food was a "genuine case." However, the good rector had been deceived once or twice, and determined to give the next comer a rigid cross-examination. It so happened that the next "case" claimed alms on the ground that he was a Churchman—or an "Episcopalian," according to the usage of Delaware in those days, and the Dr. called upon him to prove his right to the name by reciting his belief—"no creed, no pie." Whereupon came the stammered reply: "I believe in all things visible and invisible."

AN answer, given in one of the Cambridge local examinations, was particularly bright. The question was in mechanics, and was: "Why will a pin not balance on its point?" The reply was, "Firstly, because a point being that which has no magnitude, it cannot stand upon what does not exist. Secondly, it will, if you stick it in." "The people of Herculaneum and Pompeii died from an eruption," was the answer to a question concerning the deaths from the great eruption of Vesuvius in A. D. 79, and an eminently practical answer to a question as to where Magna Charta was signed, was, "At the bottom."

CLERICAL brother sends us the following: In a Scotch theological seminary, the president used to ask the young men from time to time to lead in the daily devotions, so that they might be enabled to know how to pray aright. This is a part of the prayer uttered by one of them: "Oh, Lord, bless our professor. We know he is poor, weak, and ignorant; strengthen his hands, confirm his feeble knees, that he may go in and out before us like the he goat before his flock."

Notes from "Eaglesnest"

VIII.

THE harbor of Old Mission is thus described, in the account of Mr. Hannah's voyage from Chicago (1850) to examine the site of what is now Traverse City.

"The scene before them as the vessel rounded to in the harbor, appeared to the tempest-tossed voyagers the loveliest ever beheld by mortal eyes. The sun was just sinking behind the western hills, the white-washed houses of the Indian village gleaming brightly in his parting rays, while the tops of the forest trees seemed bathed in a floating mist of gold. On the bank sat a picturesque group of Indian men, enjoying the fragrant fumes of the pipe. The women were seen engaged in the feminine avocations pertaining to their simple mode of life. The shouting of a company of children in gleeful play, mingled with the sound of tinkling bells from a herd of ponies feeding on the hillside beyond, made music in harmony with the quiet beauty of the scene."

Old Mission harbor is even more beautiful now, I think than it could have been then. There is of course the same "floating mist of gold" at sunset, the sound of children at play, the forests and the shore. At some points even the "fragrant fumes of the pipe" may still be discerned. But there are charms and varied notes of beauty now that never were seen when lazy red men lounged along the beach. On one side of the harbor, bright cottages gleam out from under the dark pines and hemlocks, and bright flags at sunset flash upon the background of the dim northern sky. Opposite, on the southern shore, there are gleaming harvest fields and orchards, and houses that are real homes, and roads and fences and other marks of thrift and prosperity. Pretty boats cleave the clear waters, whereon the gold, the green, the crimson, and the blue of the sky have fallen. The floating mist of gold has been smitten by fire, and out of its depths glories of colored light have sprung; they leap to the zenith, they spread out along the horizon, they submerge the clouds, they go down to the depths and incarnadine the waters. We seem to float between two fathomless seas of fire, and the flames touch us not. From ten thousand shattered rainbows the palette could not be furnished with color to paint such a scene.

In other words, we still have remarkably fine sunsets at Old Mission, and "Eaglesnest" is in a position where we have full view of the wondrous effects of color in the sky and on the water, such as no other point on the harbor affords.

But what is the use of sunsets and rainbows and birds and flowers, and all that sort of thing?

"God might have bade the earth bring forth
Enough for great and small;
The oak tree and the cedar tree,
Without a flower at all."

He might, but He didn't. He might have made the world all one color, have made the air to vibrate only to one tone, have constructed everything on one pattern. That is what we should expect of law and force working out blindly to develop a world. What a saw-mill world it would have been! But our God is not an abstract Almighty, a vague Somewhat, turning the wheel of Fate behind the scenes. He is Reason and Love and Beauty and Goodness, as well as Law. The beauty of the world is not thought into it by mind of man; it is in the world by the Will of God, and is a reflection of the beauty of His own nature. It was there before man was made to share the delight of it with Him. He looked upon these flashing seas and flaming sunsets before the dry land appeared, and He rejoiced in the beauty and splendor of the light. Even now He makes flowers to bloom and birds to sing where He alone can see and hear them. "O Lord our Governor, how excellent is thy Name in all the world; thou hast set thy glory above the heavens."

The Rev. Hoong Niock Woo

FROM The Spirit of Missions we condense the following interesting story of the life of the oldest native priest of our Chinese mission: Hoong Niock Woo was connected with our mission boarding school in 1850, and was among the twenty boys whom Bishop Boone placed in charge of Miss Fay upon her arrival in the mission. For several years he remained under her instruction, and was considered a patient, studious pupil. In the course of time a change was made in the administration of the school, and a new teacher was placed in charge. This change, however, proved disastrous, as one boy after another took refuge in running away. Miss Fay, upon going to her class-room one morning, saw a slate lying upon her desk, on which was written: "Now, dear Miss Fay, I run away like other boys. Superintendent says I am dunce. I think I stupid. I go. Your affectionate Hoong Niok." Some of the boys sought employment in the city, which they easily found because of their knowledge of the English language. Others secured positions as stewards upon an American man-of-war then lying in the harbor and about to leave for America. Hoong Niok was among the number who sailed with the ship.

The late John S. Messersmith, M.D. (who afterward became Medical Director of the United States navy), when attached to the U. S. man-of-war "Mississippi," under Captain Buchanan, with the expedition of Commodore Perry to Japan, took "Hoong" with him to his home in Lancaster, and apprenticed him to a local paper, The Examiner. In this position he served faithfully for seven years. He was a devout member of St. James' parish, and a regular attendant upon the services. He became a naturalized citizen, and during the Civil War joined an emergency regiment, the 50th Pennsylvania militia, in which he served three months. Mrs. Messersmith, the widow of the surgeon, speaks very enthusiastically of "Hoong," laying stress on his "unique ability, sterling honesty, and his appreciative qualities."

In a private letter written to a friend in Lancaster, Mr. Woo says:

I am the only naturalized Chinese citizen in Lancaster. There were two Chinese in the army in the Civil War, one serving in the Southern Army, and myself in the Northern; now both of us are serving in the greatest and noblest army of Christ, fighting for the last twenty-five years or more against Satan and the darkness of superstition, and the greatest heathenism on the globe.

After eight years' residence in this country, Hoong Niok returned to his native land, arriving in Shanghai just after the death of Bishop Boone. The Rev. E. H. Thomson, who was in the mission, and who was well known to Hoong Niok, was applied to for work. Not having the means to pay him, Mr. Thomson was obliged to let him go, much to his regret. So Hoong Niok engaged himself as an interpreter in an English establishment where Chinese workmen were employed. In the meantime he attended regularly the Sunday services of the mission, and under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, was led to seek for Orders. On March 1st, 1866, he joined the mission, and devoted his whole time to its interests.

He developed a strong liking for the practice of medicine, nursing and caring for the sick. When Mr. Thomson projected the plan of establishing a hospital in Shanghai in 1868, Hoong Niok was at once interested. Dr. McGowan, an American physician then living in Shanghai, took a great fancy to him, and cheerfully gave him instruction in medicine, loaned him books to study, and often took him upon visits to patients. In this way he became after a while so expert in treating the ordinary diseases of the people, that Dr. McGowan often trusted him to administer medicine to them during his absence. This was the beginning of our present hospital work in Shanghai. Under Bishop Williams, he was admitted candidate for Holy Orders in 1868, and studied zealously under the Rev. Mr. Thomson, and afterward under the Rev. Dr. Nelson and the bishop. He devoted much time to the native mission schools that were under his charge, and made addresses several times a week. On May 1st, 1873, Hoong Niok Woo was admitted to the Order of Deacons, and was placed in charge of St. Paul's chapel at Kong-wan, then a town of 30,000 inhabitants, four miles from Shanghai. For seven years Mr. Woo labored at this station with great zeal and enthusiasm. A new church was erected soon after his entering upon the work, and many persons were baptized and confirmed.

On May 25, 1880, he was advanced to the priesthood by Bishop Schereschewsky. Mr. Woo still continued the charge of St. Paul's, Kong-wan, but kept extending the sphere of his labors. During the building of St. Luke's Hospital in 1883, Mr. Woo was especially active in eliciting large contributions from the Chinese with which to carry on the work. In 1885, he was appointed chaplain of St. Luke's. He has also been successful in establishing dispensaries in several places, a work which his ripe experience particularly qualified him for. In every department of missionary work—in building and equipping churches, chapels, schools, hospitals and dispensaries, in preaching the Gospel, or teaching the young, or caring for the sick and dying—this noble servant of God has been faithful, in season and out of season.

Mr. Woo is still in charge of St. Paul's, Kong-wan, with seven other places. He is assisted by two deacons, the Rev. T. M. Chang and the Rev. T. L. Wu.

Book Reviews and Notices

The True Limits of Ritual in the Church. Edited by Robert Linklater, D.D. New York: Longmans, Green & Co. Pp. 250. Price, $1.50.

This is a volume of singular interest and importance. There is no denying that there is just now a crisis in the Church of England. Lawlessness in the conduct of divine service has gone to great lengths amongst all parties of Churchmen. A large majority of the English clergy are accustomed to disregard the plain ceremonial provisions of the Prayer Book, adding to, subtracting from, and altering the services according to their own will. We in America would find it impossible to realize how far this has gone. It has at last become intolerable, and vigorous efforts are being made to secure a strict observance of the law. This book is an effort by some of the Catholic leaders to define the limits of ritual liberty, and to bring about a general recognition of the fundamental principles, doctrinal and liturgical, upon which the Church of England rests. They have brought together into one volume a series of practical and scholarly essays, dealing with different phases of the subject, and making altogether a very strong and full presentment of their case. The papers composing it are as follows: Introductory Essay, by Dr. Linklater; "The Ornaments Rubric," by J. T. Mickelthwaite; "The Catholic Principle of Conformity in Divine Worship," by the Rev. C. F. G. Turner (very valuable); "A Plea for Reasonableness," by the Rev. John Wylde; "Intelligible Ritual," by the Rev. Henry Arnott; "The English Liturgy," by the Rev. T. A. Laacey (a liturgical treatise of solid and permanent value); "Eucharistic Ritual," by the Rev. W. F. Cobb, D. D., and "Suggestions for a Basis of Agreement in Matters Liturgical and Ceremonial," by the Rev. H. E. Hall. We strongly advise Catholic Churchmen, and all others who feel an intelligent interest in religious questions, to buy and read this book. We know of no other in which present day questions are so wisely and ably dealt with. If its sound and sensible principles are generally adopted, the ritual crisis which now convulses the Church of England will soon be past, and will leave her stronger than before.

Enchanted India. By Prince Bojidar Karageorgevitch. New York: Harper & Brothers. 1899. Price, $1.75.

"Enchanted India" it surely is, for no country on the earth presents such fascinating contrasts as India. The flow of every day life is a vast pageant of magnificence and misery, this last as interesting as the first. Over it all is an atmosphere of mystery, coming from gods and men and nature. The various religions of India bind all together in a weird unity of sacred plants and animals and worshipping people. The strange growths of the teeming land are reflected in the gorgeous cults of heathenism, and all life is a varied combination of color and motion, rapturous to the æsthetic sense. Behind all this is a past full of the prehistoric remains of forgotten temples and powers. Our author passes from end to end of India, embracing also in his travels the Island of Ceylon. We are given vivid impressions, like gorgeously tinted miniatures, of all that he sees.

If one would have a living impression of India, its past and its present, one should read this book. The heathen worship, the vast architecture of the temples, the crowds of pilgrims, the dying devotees by the waves of the Ganges, the awful sights of the burning dead, the fearful effects of plague and famine, the wild mixture of Indian cities where European vice and native profligacy meet, all can be found in this well-told story, where everything is presented with a sure touch and the most refined purity and taste. Through it all also one can detect a certain wonder at the strange occupancy of this marvelous land by a comparative handful of Englishmen, who by consummate pluck and diplomatic skill, backed up by an ever-ready willingness and power to fight, have kept the masses of that enchanted India under control, crowning the edifice of their occupancy by making their own Island Queen the Empress of this very India.

The Perfect Life. Sermons by the Rev. W. J. Knox Little, Canon of Worcester, and Vicar of Hoar Cross. New York: Longmans, Green & Co. Pp. 368. Price, $2.

No doubt most of our readers are familiar with Canon Knox Little's pulpit style. He has been so often heard, and his published sermons have been so widely read in America, that he is by no means a stranger amongst American Churchmen. It is sufficient to say that the contents of this volume exhibit the well-known characteristics of his work. He has brought to their composition his most highly matured powers as a preacher, and they probably represent the best that he can do. Their range of topics is very wide. After a series of sermons on various aspects and experiences of life, he enters upon ground which he has made peculiarly his own. We know of no living preacher who has so closely studied the Passion of our Lord, and entered so deeply into its sacred mysteries, as he. We are therefore glad to find in this volume three sermons on Labor, Society, and Moral Life in the Light of the Passion. Another series of great interest and value treats at length of the sacraments of the Church, devoting a sermon each to Holy Baptism, Confirmation, Holy Orders, Penitence, Holy Marriage, Unction, and the Holy Eucharist. In these sermons his sound theological learning and wonderful powers of lucid expression are brought into full play. We recommend them to all students of theology and lovers of good preaching. It goes without saying that they ought to be found in every well-stocked clerical library.

Periodicals

The International for August has a unique cover design. A simple chalk sketch on a blue ground, representing a weary woman sitting in the window, worn out with the heat and toil of the long summer day. It is a touching reminder that the heated term brings suffering to many who are compelled to work in unhealthy tenement houses. The leading paper (illustrated) of this issue is, "Quebec, the Silver City." Dr. R. W. Conant's comments on leading articles in other magazines are very clever. The Paris Letter has valuable suggestions for those who intend visiting the Exposition next summer. With Lesson XIV in this issue the course in Spanish is completed.

EASY DIVORCE.—No expression is more completely descriptive of the methods pursued in many cases, than the hackneyed one, "divorces secured with secrecy and despatch." It is a rule of the Prothonotary's Office that the papers in such litigations shall be accessible only to parties in interest or their counsel. This is founded on the principle that such litigations are private matters, to which the general public have no right. The title of the case, the memoranda of papers filed, rules taken, and decrees made, forming a skeleton record of the litigation, are usually placed on the docket of the office. This is not always the case. Instances occurred again and again during the Ledger's investigation where the deepest secrecy seemed also to be sought in the skeleton records. This was accomplished by omitting portions of the entries, making it impossible for a searcher to learn who were the parties to the proceeding. Divorce cases and foreign attachments take the first numbers in the books. In very many instances the space reserved for a case would be entirely blank, or sometimes the name of counsel, or the surname of the parties, scrawled across the page in lead-pencil. The dockets for 1898 show twelve such blanks in that portion of the books where divorces appear; those for 1899 have forty-four unfilled spaces of this character.

SUPERFICIAL CRITICISM.—The present writer is probably as far as any one of his readers can be from sympathizing with the doctrines, spirit, and practices of the Anglican High-Church party. But he sees that much of the adverse criticism passed upon these things is futile, because the meaning of the High-Church movement is not understood, and no account is made of that which is the real heart and inspiration of the movement. No party is formed with adherents who are prepared to labor and suffer for their cause, unless somewhere in the ideas and purposes of the party there is something real, and which seems to earnest men to be a sufficient reason for devotion and toil. All parties, no matter how good their cause, may have camp followers, mercenaries, and pretenders. But he is a poor judge of human nature and the movements that make history who judges parties by the eccentricities, the vanities, the duplicities, and the vagaries of those who are caught and held for a time by some passing excitement or selfish advantage. It is easy to laugh at the fuss made about candles, processions, robes, gestures, intonations, and confessions. But gibes and jests and superficial criticism never clear the air. Directed against the High-Church party, they make it more difficult than ever to understand why such trivial things should engage the attention of men and women who are so earnest, so intelligent, and so devout.

ROMANISM IN ENGLAND.—A subject which is frequently discussed is the possible return of England to the Roman Catholic faith. It was a dream of Cardinal Manning, a hope of Cardinal Newman, and that Church has periodically given out her great gains from the educated and well-to-do classes. The subject is once more a favorite topic, following the publication of an able article by Mr. Richard Bagot, himself a Roman Catholic. Since Manning's days, Mr. Bagot holds that no great advance has been made by his Church. True, monasteries have been built and new churches added, but these he attributes to the never-dying zeal of the Church, which looks well to her outposts. The people, however, are not responding to the appeals of the priests. Many of those who attend the services at the large churches do so to hear the music, or out of curiosity, and are a transient, passing by, element, not to be counted upon as sympathizing with, or even understanding, the doctrines of the Church. The fact that persecution for the faith is unheard of now in Great Britain is only a proof that perfect toleration exists, but is not to be taken as an indication that the English people are less tenacious of their Protestantism because more tolerant of other views. Then, says Mr. Bagot, the accessions for many years have been from the substratum of the population. Rarely indeed are to be found the names of men or women noted in science, commerce, learning, or society, among the converts. Such are the conclusions of a devoted Roman Catholic, a writer of known ability, whose article has obtained world-wide publicity through the religious and secular press.

The Household

The "Lady of the House"

THE swing of the pendulum has been wide: from the ridiculous effrontery of the "washerlady" and the "competent lady" desirous of doing our cooking at a wage of $50 a month, society has taken refuge in the use of "woman" as a name never lacking in dignity when unstained. Yet this also has found its abuse, and the newspapers now use the new form with an indiscriminating freedom which frequently jars upon fastidious ears. The abuse of an ennobling appellation should only make it more honorable when rightly used as distinctive. I have in mind the description of a recent accident in which two unprotected gentlewomen showed much dignity and presence of mind in an alarming position. The reporters, with great unanimity, declared that "the women were very plucky." The courtesy of calling them ladies would have been in this case a protection which they deserved. It is good to remember that being a lady means a very lovely thing, and something widely different from living in splendor and wearing gorgeous raiment.

"This beneficent and legal dominion of the Domina or House-Lady is great and venerable," and is something to aspire to. With its utterance, visions arise of what such a one ought to be. An effort has been made to find a derivation which would make it infer benevolence, "a divider of bread," but the more learned philologists claim for its origin the feminine of the old Anglo-Saxon word for lord, and surely it means to us one who rules home and herself after the codes of highest human development. It lifts the mistress into the higher realm, where courtesy and decorum and refining gentleness reign paramount, and the uplifting law of love is administered to the defeat of all rancor and strife.

It means also a responsibility, the forgetfulness of which forfeits the title. She cannot truly be worthy to be called "Domina," who lays down her sceptre and lets hirelings rule in her stead. The draperies may hang in all due order, the silver may gleam upon the board, the viands may be pre-eminently excellent, through the skilled service of men and women of lower order, but the atmosphere which makes the home pure, restful, inspiring, and wholly beautiful, cannot be created by any one without the training of a Christian gentlewoman and the education which has come from higher sources than text-books.

"It is little to say of a woman that she does not destroy as she passes. She should revive." From the Lady-of-the-House should come the refreshment of all the dwellers under her roof. When she gives her orders for the programme of the day, the hot and weary cook should feel that an invigorating, inspiring influence has passed over her, after the brief visit which brought a figure of delicate daintiness to sit in the hastily dusted chair, and a kindly and commanding voice changed the drudgery of cooking into a pleasant duty by which the weak were to be made strong, the children to be pleased by wholesome "goodies," and the purse of the master kept from waste and robbery. And by ascending steps each in turn should find in this guiding genius of the small realm a place of rest and refuge, up to the master, whose only solace for life's care is found at her side.

Through her comes the order which makes the mere necessary eating and drinking a grace and pleasure; through her the ribald word is held in check, the unfair judgment reprov'd, the voice of scandal hushed. The poor emigrant girl who, motherless and thrown on her own resources, seeks her bread in the service of the household, feels the restraint of a steady, instructed teacher of its economics, and finds a friend, in the light of whose example and the strength of whose counsel she is kept from folly.

The woman who makes her morning a time of mere slatternly gathering up of the disordered fragments of yesterday, can never hope to hold the reins which guide the domestic forces into "the realm of upper-day." The fair serenity of a cheerful face and the sweet freshness of a well-chosen breakfast dress are like the rising of an indoor sun to those who gather about the family table for their morning meal. The school-boy orders his hoisterous tone to respond to her thoughtful questioning; he feels conscious of his personal untidiness or the careless gathering of books and papers; he realizes the latent barbarism in his strong young life, and feels that influence which, until he develops the unique allegiance of a lover, makes him bow to the lady-of-his-love, his mother. The door does not slam, the hands are cared for, the body is clean to the standard of a gentleman's cleanliness, and he is tamed by the presence of the lady whom he honors as much as by the parent he obeys. There is scarcely a more sure way of lifting the standard of family life up to the rule of true refinement than by guarding the morning meeting from disorder and discord, and inviting both beauty of service and gentle good order to preside over the breakfast-table.

In old tournaments, knights could not meet for honor's sake alone, unless they bore the favor of a fair lady; it was not possible, according to knightly faith, that a man should do his best in any feat of arms without a name and face to conjure by which were for him the noblest and the fairest in the world. In life's harder tussels, in the grim and sordid fight for bread and recognition in the world's fierce battle for supremacy, the old chivalric idea holds true to-day, though we means more to-day than it did in Arthur's time. He that lacks the inspiration for endeavor given by the tender sharer of his life; he who hears only of more money, more luxury, more adornment from the wife for whom he toils, or, being single, knows no loftier cause for effort than his own aggrandizement, is terribly handicapped. He who is sent forth from an atmosphere calmed by the gentle sway of the serene "Domina" who lives to exercise her healing charm, enters office or workshop of any sort where toil awaits him, blessed with a strength to do his best; he who knows that the eyes that gave a silent benediction as he closed the door, would welcome him with tenfold joy if he came back an honorable hero, is never tempted to lose her respect by too keen a reaching after wealth. He knows that were his home a hut and his sustenance a crust, the lady of his home would make the one beautiful and his other enough to suffice.

To deserve truly the name, this ruler must see to it that the poor know her to be their friend; that the dishonest and unjust do not rob or defraud her; that everything is beautiful after its kind. If her dress be of cotton-print, it must be fair in color, spotless and uncreased, and fit to be adorned with a rose, if she should chose to wear one. No need for velvets and satins to adorn, or a many-roomed dwelling to en-throne, the lady who makes everything elegant by her own informing touch. I have in my remembrance one who outrivaled every other whom I ever knew, but whose frugal simplicity would alarm most of our workingmen's wives to-day, and whose "high breeding" hid endeavor so effectually that it was never seen.

With a mixture of chagrin and surprise, on turning to "Sesame and Lilies" to verify a quotation, I find that all that I have written is but a weak paraphrase of Ruskin's faultless essay. I have not even read it for twenty years, and it recalls the eager, far-away first reading, and the thirsty drinking-in of his inspiring counsel. It had "rooted and grounded" itself so deeply that I had forgotten its tenacious growth; transplanted into soil that welcomed it, it seemed to be indigenous.

I leave it, the borrowed and the original, as it stands. The girls and women of to-day do not read Ruskin, as we, his contemporaries, did; we see stray essays illustrated by various photographs, which talk much of his artistic theories and show how cleverly he drew a feather or a snow-capped mountain. But the man who set women thinking what to do with their lives; who bade them remember with awe what they could do with the magic of a fair face; he who called men to recognize the brotherhood of man, and to reverence toil; who demanded with the strenuous force of a prophet and a seer that no one should eat the bread of idleness, is not known among us to-day, except when some faint echo reaches us of the thunder tones he sent pealing through the world of his young day.

It matters comparatively little whether he thought Turner greater than his fellows, or set forth certain rules of criticism, or even of endeavor for a purer art wherewith to enrich the world. What he did best was to speak to the youth of both sexes as never other man of his race and generation spake, as to their gifts and their responsibility. How many men born since 1870 know of that extraordinary address to the young soldiers at Woolwich, which he called "War"? How many have read the "Mystery of Life and its Arts"?

How many young women making ready to marry and rule their households, have learned from him that "a woman's power is for rule, not for battle"—that "her intellect is for sweet ordering, arrangement, and decision"—that "the true nature of a home is a place of peace"—that "marriage, when it is marriage at all, is only the seal which marks the vowed transition of temporary into untiring service, and of fitful into eternal love"?

What a white light these suggestive thoughts throw before the entering bride as she steps over the threshold of her new home to become the centre of its order, the source of its good or evil influences. How small do the furnishings appear in her eyes who lifts her glance to the possible measure of good she may attain, and trembles lest she falls short! With what pride does she strengthen her faith in the boundless possibilities of her endeavor; with what humility does she feel the ease with which she may fail?

In what we call "society," it is said that 1898 was the "year of weddings." Will any bride write over her door: "Where a true wife comes, there home is always around her"?—"C." in The New York Evening Post.

Curious Places Where Nests Have Been Built

A FEW days ago the Daily Mail gave publicity to the eccentric behavior of a number of robins which had built their nests in the organ pipes of St. Augustine's church, Bournemouth.

Places of worship have always been favorite building places for birds, but it is not often that a nest is found in a pew. One Sunday, however, when the family of Wykeham Musgrave were entering their pew at Thame Park chapel, Oxfordshire, they found a half-made robin's nest on the book-ledge, between a hymn book and a prayer book. They decided to retire to another seat in favor of the little red-breast intruder, and by the following Sunday the nest was not only finished, but five eggs had been laid in it.

During the whole of the next Sunday's service the robin sat in the nest, and it was subsequently found that four young ones had been hatched. For two or three Sundays afterwards, the attentive mother could be seen flying in and out of the chapel during the service, conveying food for her offspring.

The extraordinary situations in which nests are occasionally discovered almost give one the impression that birds must be endowed with a sense of humor. For instance, when a bird selects a scarecrow whereon to build a habitation and a home, it really seems to be poking fun at the farmer or gardener who has resorted to this device to frighten off the winged ravagers of his crops.

At a flower show held at Whitstable, Kent, last year, an exhibit which attracted a great deal of attention, was a scarecrow from a field of growing peas, in the head of which a very confiding bird had constructed its nest. But a still more curious kind of scarecrow which had been utilized for the same purpose, was presented to the Grosvenor Museum, Chester, a short time afterwards. A gamekeeper on the Carden Park estate in that county, one day shot a sparrow hawk, which he hung upon a tree as a warning to other feathered depredators. The interesting discovery was subsequently made that a wren had, in the most ingenious manner conceivable, built its nest upon the scarecrow, fixing it on the underside of the dead bird's body, between the wings and legs.

In another case, a wren chose an almost equally strange place for a nest. In a sheep yard on Mr. Hodson's farm at Iford, Sussex, there happened to be last year an old jacket hanging from a beam. In one of the pockets of this the gentle little bird had made its nest, which, when it was discovered, contained five eggs.

It was a wren, too, that made its home in an old cannon at Kiel Harbor. Into the bore of this ancient piece of ordnance some mischievous urchins had stuffed a quantity of rubbish, and on its being cleaned out, a wren's nest was found at the extreme end of the bore, immediately below the touchhole.

The neighborhood at that time was much infested by the predatory feline, and it was doubtless instinct which prompted the wren to make its nest in the cannon, where it could bring up its young without the risk of molestation.

The ubiquitous sparrow seems to have a great partiality for the railway. A few seasons ago, one built a nest between the West inghouse brake of one of the London, Tilbury and Southend Railway Company's coaches and the bottom of the coach. The carriage was one in constant use, forming part of the local train running between Fenchurch Street and Dagenham. The nest was not disturbed, and the eggs were duly hatched.

In several instances a letter box has been used as a nesting place. At Spaulding, a season or two ago, a bird built its nest, and successfully reared its young, in a farmer's letter box. In order that it should not be disturbed, the farmer went to the trouble of having a temporary box fitted up for the reception of his letters.—London Mail.

Visiting the Sick

VISITING the sick is one of the greatest privileges we have. Often a call will do a sick person as much good as the medicine he is taking. Frequently one hears the words: "His visit did me so much good," or "I believe I feel better for seeing him." But one hears, too, the remark: "Oh, dear, how tired that man makes me." It is for this last reason that I venture a few words of this delicate subject.

The sick are often very thoughtful; they not only look forward to seeing visitors, but watch every expression of the face, and treasure up every word that is said. After the visitor is gone, too, the words said often occupy the patient's whole mind and thought until the next visit. It must be evident, then, that one should speak with great care, particularly if the conversation turns to the sick one's condition, and the matter of progress or improvement is touched upon. Often a single careless remark or unguarded answer will cause a patient great anxiety or even a sleepless night. It is well to avoid talking of the patient himself, or of matters relating to the sick room. There is everything in expressing hopeful and encouraging opinions, and the brighter you appear the more good you have done the patient. Glum faces have no business in the sick room, and do more harm than good.

Flowers are almost always a blessing. I have often heard people say that it was the flowers that helped them get well. It is only occasionally that flowers are disagreeable or that their odor does harm, and they are surely a greater blessing when one can enjoy them than when past enjoyment. As some one has said: "It is better to be sweetened with a little taffy while alive than to be showered with epitaphy when dead." In short, don't wait until your friends are dead to send them flowers.

Books, particularly illustrated books and magazines, are most acceptable, for when one cannot read, pictures may be enjoyed. And if you wish to direct the mind to religious things, the magazines of to-day are filled with copies of the world's most famous religious paintings. For a few cents a great number of these can be procured. It is a fact that current periodicals are doing a great work in the education of the masses in art. Through them, famous pictures, with their ennobling influences, find their

The Covering for Croquettes.

Pillsbury's VITOS is a better covering for chicken, lobster, meat, rice and other croquettes than bread crumbs or cracker meal, because, owing to its granular nature, it does not become mushy or greasy. way into sick rooms, hospitals, manufactories, unsavory alleys, and tenements, and help countless thousands by the lessons they teach. It takes but a few minutes to cut out choice pictures and make a scrap book, and then you have a lasting collection of improving pictures of which the sick will never tire. Copies of "The Madonna" and pictures of the life of Christ are much more fitting in hospital wards than illuminated texts, such as: "If riches increase, set not your heart upon them," and "Man is but vanity." Too often the sick in hospitals are there from necessity, not from choice, and it is hardly probable that their pocket-books are as full as the horn of plenty.

If you bring books, let them be of the kind calculated to take the mind away from suffering. Under no circumstances should you give a sick person a book you would not enjoy yourself. The treasures of literature are inexhaustible, and there is a vast list from which to choose. If your friend is in the hospital, leave something that you do not wish returned, and when he has recovered from his illness, the books may be of use to other patients or nurses. Poetry is particularly acceptable, but in all cases you should study the patient to see what will please and interest him.

There are many other things that are always acceptable in the sick room, whether the patient be rich or poor, such as cologne, good things to eat, etc., and when you are gone, they serve as a remembrance.

Never make a long visit on a very sick person. If you do, you have defeated your own end and have done the patient harm instead of good. Then, too, you are saved the chagrin of being asked to withdraw by the nurse or physician. A short visit full of bright conversation, with perhaps an allusion to something of the outside world, and always with words of encouragement, is what does good. And if you promise to call again at a certain time, be sure to do so, for you will probably be expected, and there will be disappointment if you are late or fail to appear.

If you intend to talk of religious things, and quite likely your friend will want you to, use tact in presenting them. Lead his thoughts rather than command them. Always avoid the long face and solemn tone that we have learned to associate with hypocrisy. The sick are most appreciative and rarely fail to recognize sincerity and sympathy. For it is this very same sympathy that you have called to express, and this is nothing less than a fulfillment of the divine commandment "to comfort and help the weak hearted," to carry solace to those who need it most.—W. LEWIS CHAPMAN, M.D., in St. Andrew's Cross.

Tin and Rats

A TWO-HORSE load of tin clippings was being transferred to the rear basement of a prominent hotel. It had come from a can factory, and the narrow, curling strips had become so twisted and intertwined as to form a conglomerate mass that was moved with the greatest difficulty by two sturdy fellows with stableforks. A bystander who was curious enough to inquire what use a swell hotel had for such truck was answered by an attache of the house: "We use it for rats. I mean the big, gray fellows with whiskers. The hotel rat is bigger, bolder and wiser than any other rat. He laughs at traps, fattens on poison, and the killing or chasing of dogs, cats, and ferrets is his pet diversion. Even when energetic measures have rid us of the pests they are with us again in augmented force within a day or two. They will tunnel through almost anything for incredible distances. It is their boring ability that has given us so much trouble hitherto. No matter how we closed up their passageways, the routes were promptly reopened. Filling the holes with broken glass was considered a good scheme until we found that with marvelous patience they removed the glass piece by piece.

"But we think we've got them now. With this tangled up tin we construct a sort of abatis, covering all places where the beasts are likely to enter our cellars. They can't get through it. They can't chew it, and they can't carry it away as they do broken bottles, for when Mr. Rat takes hold of a single strip of the tin he finds it an inseparable part of a net-work weighing many pounds."—Philadelphia Record.

The Geysers of Iceland

PROBABLY most of us think of Iceland as a very unattractive place, especially as to scenery, but Lady Anna von Rydingsvard, in the July International, treats us to some new ideas of that lonely little Island. In "A Visit to Iceland" she gives an interesting account of a trip she took to the geyser fields.

"Barren as the place really is," writes Lady von Rydingsvard, "the artist's eye would revel in the beautiful effects on the snowy jokulls, the twilight softening shades of mauve, greens and grays on the distant lava peaks, and the luminous midnight sky. The intensity of the blue water of lake or ocean is superb, and the mighty waterfalls are grand. And the Geyser fields! All the warm tints, from cream to russet, are found in the mineral deposit around the basin of the Great Geyser, Little Geyser, Strokkr (the Churn), and the Little Strokkr, while Blesi (the Blue One) is lined with exquisite white, like porcelain, making it a fitting vessel for the cooking of food, and for furnishing boiling water for our tea and coffee. It was so smooth and beautiful that I seemed to be mutilating something rare when I chipped off pieces of its lining; but I knew they would be valuable souvenirs, and the uneasy, bubbling water would soon amend the deficiency.

"The mud pools on this plain are the most dangerous, for they spout hot mud diagonally out of the earth. Coming upon them in one direction, they are not seen, and many a visitor has gone home with a scalded foot. The hydraulic display is now very fitful, as inconsiderate tourists have injured the spouting fountains by loading stones into them to see them cast out, so you must take your tent with you, and encamp on the plain to await the pleasures of their majesties. Blesi will serve you well while waiting. The Great Geyser had not spouted for a week when we were there, and such surliness indicated a near activity. The water spouted unusually high when it finally appeared, 150 feet, and showed all the tints of the rainbow, majestic at the same time and mysterious. It played for fifteen minutes, and then its beautiful cascades subsided in feathery mist, a refined and graceful withdrawal."

WHEN the church of the Nativity, Huntsville, Ala., was built, the words "Reverence My Sanctuary" were placed over the front door. During the late war a surgeon in the Federal army seeking a large building for hospital purposes, selected this church as most suitable, intending to take out the pews, put in hospital cots, and thus convert it into a hospital, using the adjoining building for his supplies. Another surgeon who was with him remarked: "You can't do that, look over that door." The first surgeon read the inscription aloud and replied: "You are right; I can't take that church with that written over the door."

"ARE you glad to see me, Johnnie?" asked the minister, as he took the pride of the household on his knee. "Yeth, thir" lisped the little fellow. "Tell me why you are glad to see me," asked the good man. "Becauth," was the reply, "when you rithit uth we alwayth have a good dinner."

WELL FED, WELL BRED.

Proper Food Makes Brainy Men and Beautiful Women.

To know just what to eat is a problem for many people who find their strength and health not keeping up to a proper stage. From food we must expect our bodily nourishment, and not from drugs. True, a physician's care is required at times, but the true physician will always seek to put his patient on properly selected food and drink.

A food expert has discovered Grape-Nuts by experimenting on the treatment of grains to artificially pre-digest the starches (the principal part). Grape-Nuts, as now made by the Postum Cereal Co., Lim., of Battle Creek, Mich., and sold by grocers generally, is a delicious dainty, suitable particularly for the brain worker, as it quickly supplies the parts of food the body needs to supply the daily loss produced by brain work. Unless the right food be furnished and properly digested, the individual discovers a gradual failing, and some form of disease sets up.

Users of Grape-Nuts discover that they assist in the digestion of cream and other food, and that a "well fed feeling" follows their use.

The Baby

We have no king, we have no queen, so all the people say;
But that is wrong, because there's one we always must obey.
It's known in truth, on ev'ry side, though men may rise and fall,
There's one supreme, to whom we bow—the baby rules us all.

In hut or palace, town or wood, in circles high or low,
At home, abroad, afloat, ashore, wherever we may go,
We say we're independent in whatever we would do,
And yet we show our slav'ry when we hear a baby coo.

We dance, we sing, we clap our hands, we buy all kinds of toys;
We do all sorts of foolish things we think the child enjoys.
There's nothing in this wide, wide world, as ev'ry one must know,
We will not do that we may hear the baby laugh and crow.

We have no king, we have no queen, so all the people
say;
But that is wrong, because there's one we always
must obey.
It's known in truth, on ev'ry side, and it should give us joy,
The babe is king of all the world—what say you, eh,
my boy?

One Way

I HAVE always been sensitive to cruelty to animals; therefore, one day some years ago, when I heard the unmistakable sickening thud of blows, and a furious voice, I ran to the door. I knew what I should see—two horses with quivering nostrils and frightened eyes and straining wet flanks, a loaded wagon fast in the mire, and a man with cruel whip lashing the horses in vain.

There they were, all three, and on the sidewalk, either side of the muddy road, the usual half-dozen advisers. Advisers and man had lost their tempers.

"Don't beat those horses," shrieked a woman, "or I'll call the police!"

"Say, you'll never get out without unloading, or another pair of horses!" This from a man between puffs of his cigar.

An undistinguishable chorus of pity and indignation made a background for these louder remarks; and even through my own anger, I had a perception that the man was getting a drubbing as well as the horses.
Not a word said he, except to his horses.
But he heard and he felt, and he grew more furious every moment. One of the poor beasts tugged with every muscle at each shout; the other had, apparently, abandoned the effort in despair, and gave no sign beyond a tremor of his limbs when the lash fell.

I felt a sting of pity and anger at the sight, and then I saw my brother coming down the street. "Now," I thought, "it will be all right. Nat will thrash him if he doesn't stop!"

He came, he took in all the scene in one quick glance, and then, to my intense astonishment, instead of the stern reproof and a threat to give him a thrashing with his own whip, Nat shouted in a positively friendly tone: "Want a little help?"

The man nearly dropped his whip; he stared sullenly, but with a new expression, at the speaker. In a minute Nat had turned up the rims of his new light trousers, had found two boards, and somehow got all the men on the sidewalk behind them prying the wagon out of the hole; and, without another blow, the horses had pulled it safely over the bad place, and were on firm ground again.

"Another time you get into the mud," said Nat cheerily, "don't whip the horses; get the fellows on the sidewalk behind your wagon to help you."

"Well, I'm very much obliged to you," said the man. "I guess I got madder than I needed to."

"That was quicker than sending for the police, or even beating the man, don't you think, Sis?" said Nat, as he came into the yard.

Nat has forgotten all about the episode, but I have not. Many a time have I rescued a beaten animal from the whip, not by re-proaching, but by helping the harassed man who was beating, because in most cases he did not know anything else that he could do.

Once, after a teamster and I, on a country road, had together pried a wagon out of the mud, I said: "Now, you'll remember, won't you, that a stick on the wheel is better than a whip on your horse's back?" and we both smiled, while he answered: "Yes, lady, I will; but I guess I'd have gone on licking the mules if you'd a scolded me instead of lending a hand."

So, I suppose the moral is that it is better to lend a hand than to scold, and that a kind act may have a longer life than its doer's memory.—OCTAVE THANET IN The Journal and Messenger.

"Well, children," said Grandpa, smiling, around their grandfather were her sturdy boys.

"Now, what shall the story be about?" asked grandpa when they were again alone.

"Oh! something you did when you were a boy, or something you saw."

Grandpa thought a moment, and then said:

"I am going to tell you about the first cook-stove I ever saw."

"Didn't they always have stoves? How could they cook without them?" came in a chorus from the children.

"No. We had a large open fireplace in our kitchen, and in it was an iron crane that had hooks of all sizes upon it. Mother would swing it out, and hang the tea kettle or potato kettle on one of the hooks, and then swing it back over the fire."

"But, grandpa, didn't you have anything to eat but boiled things—no bread or cake? How could you live without pies?"

"Most likely," said Tom, "they put the pies right down on the sticks of wood."

"Oh Tom! what if the sticks burned out and broke when the pies were half done? Then where'd they go to?" said Dick.

"Of course we had biscuit and pies," said grandpa. "Mother had a tin baker—"

"A tin baker! Was he like our baker who goes around with a cart?" interrupted Tom.

"Hardly. Ours was a kind of tin box, with a shelf in it, and one side was open. Mother put in the pies or cake, and put it very near the fire. She had to keep turning the things in the baker, or they would scorch. One day, when something had scorched, father said: 'Patience, wouldn't you like a cook-stove?' and mother said she did not know. She had never seen one, and she did not know as she could learn to cook in one. 'Well, dress up Charlie, and I will take him down to the tavern,' said father, 'for they have a new one there, and I want to see it.' So mother put on my cap, and I took father's hand and trudged off to the tavern.

"Of course they had stoves in the cities some time before this, but my home being in a small country town, when the first one came it was quite an event. So a number of men had gathered around the stove, and they were wondering how the heat could be carried to the oven so as to heat it. Finally the cook said it was his opinion that you would have to put a fire directly under the oven to heat it, and that was what those little doors were for."

"Not those little doors where the soot is cleaned out, grandpa?"

"Yes, he said the fuel must be put in there."

"Why, they couldn't put in more than three shavings at a time! Oh, I wish I could have been there. I would have told them all about the stove," said Tom.

"No doubt," said grandpa, with a smile. "But they studied it out without you. They put a fire in the fire-box, and, when the oven was hot, the cook put in a pan of cookies to bake. In a few minutes they were baked and passed around, every one pronouncing them just as good as if baked before the fire.

"In a few days our stove came, and it was such a wonder that the people came from the country all around to see it. I remember the day it came, for it was my birthday, just seventy-five years ago to-day, and I was five years old."—Sunday School Times.

Bessie's Cheerful Giving

"O WHAT a beautiful morning!" said Bessie, as she pulled aside the little white curtains and looked out of her window. "Josie will be at the station to meet me, and we will have a lovely drive."

Bessie was going to spend two weeks with a friend of hers in the country. She had planned and planned just what she was going to do and what a fine time she was going to have.

She had planned to go last year, but Roy, her little brother, was taken sick, and mamma had to do all the work, so she had to put it off.

But just as she was feeling so happy, she heard some one call her name. It was her father.

"Bessie, dear, mamma is very sick, and I guess our little girl will have to play house-keeper, and cook breakfast."

The bright smile was gone, and great, big tears were in Bessie's eyes. The father had been in a hurry and gone downstairs, so he did not see the change.

"Why should mother get sick to day? Everything is against my trip. Now I will have to stay home and cook and clean up after those mean boys, and—" But here Bessie stopped. Would it be hard to take care of mother? Mother never said it was hard to take care of Bessie when she was sick.

Then Bessie remembered what the League lesson had been, "God loveth a cheerful giver," and she remembered her kind superintendent's words, "We cannot all give money, but we can all give something—a cheerful smile, a cheerful word, a cheerful life."

Yes, Bessie would give up her trip, and give it up cheerfully. So she wiped her eyes, and, kneeling down beside her bed, asked Jesus to help her. And when a few moments later she entered the kitchen, she was all smiles. All the work seemed easy that morning to Bessie, and Roy and George were so kind and thoughtful!

"I am so sorry to have to disappoint my little girl," said her mother, as Bessie brought her some breakfast.

"Now, mother, don't you feel bad at all. I am going to keep house just as nice as you could, and there will be plenty of time next year to see Josie." Bessie brushed back her mother's hair, and kissed her fevered cheek.

After breakfast there was lots of work to do. But Bessie went singing along, and everything seemed to fly. The boys' rooms were not half as untidy as they usually were. Roy had picked up all the books and papers that he always left on the floor.

After her work was done Bessie read to her mother till she fell asleep.

Bessie was very happy when night came, but she was still happier when papa said: "Bess, little woman, I don't know what we would have done without you to day. Your being cheerful has helped me so much." And mamma said: "Bessie, dear, you have made my pain much easier to bear by your cheerful face and cheerful words." Then Bessie told her mother of her superintendent's words, and her resolution.

"How much better it was to be cheerful than to have gone about frowning and making myself and everybody else feel bad!" said Bessie that night as she went to bed.

That night Bessie's Aunt Mary came, and two days later her mother was well enough to be up again.

Bessie felt very happy as her father handed her into the car, and said: "Now be very careful—but I know you will. A little woman that can keep house like you can take care of herself."

Josie was at the station to meet her. And O what a fine time they did have! The country seemed never so pretty before.—Selected.

Finance and Commerce

THE important event of the last week in financial matters was the decision of the Secretary of the Treasury to issue treasury certificates against deposits of gold. The bankers are already taking advantage of the offer, and are depositing their gold coin and accepting the gold certificates in lieu thereof. It is expected that this will increase the available circulating medium of the country to considerable extent. Of course, until Congress declares the financial standard of the country to be gold, gold will be hoarded to a greater or less degree, but at the present time, there is an abundance of gold, and the banks find it difficult to make it circulate. Bank notes are so much more convenient for everyday uses, and people have become so accustomed to them, that many times gold is taken under remonstrance. Then, too, the expense of transporting it is so much greater. The law under which this is being done by Secretary Gage was passed in 1892. Its operation was suspended by Secretary Carlisle, in 1893, and is only now resumed. It also provides that when the gold in the treasury reserved for the redemption of United States notes falls below $100,000,000, the issue shall be suspended. This latter provision was intended to prevent the hoarding of gold, but its value in that direction is doubtful. Interest rates are still firm. The curious feature of the situation—curious because it is new—is that money is easier in the West, seemingly, than in the East, and Western banks are buying up commercial paper in the East. Also the rate of interest is higher in Berlin than in New York.

The New York bank statement was favorable in the way of increased legal reserves. There have been fairly liberal exports of wheat, corn, and provisions, for several weeks past. The government report of the crop condition, August 1st, showed the condition of the spring wheat crops nearly eight points lower than on July 1st, and estimates a total crop of spring and winter wheat at 500,000,000 bushels. This is in line with what we have been giving our readers on this point; but the government is still 50 millions too high. The acreage of corn is large, and the general condition is good, but the crop is not yet made.

A slight reduction in the condition of cotton is also reported. Wheat and cotton both have responded slightly up to this writing, and prices are not materially higher. In respect of wheat, it must be borne in mind that this year's shortage is in the exporting countries, and the importing countries have average crops, and plentiful immediate supplies. The pinch, if any, will likely come later. There are no signs of diminution in general business. Bank clearings are about 40 per cent. over last year. In Wall st., the tone of the stock market continues strong, and, though slow and somewhat labored, the advances are well maintained.

Items of Importation

The chief increase in importation last year aside from sugar, is in articles used in manufacturing; hides in 1899 being $41,988,045, against $37,068,932 in 1898, and $27,863,026 in 1897. The imports of crude rubber for use in manufacturing were in 1899, $31,876,242 in value, against $25,545,391 in 1898, and $17,558,163 in 1897. Imports of raw silk in 1899 amounted to $31,827,461, against $31,448,880 in 1898, and $18,496,944 in 1897. Imports of fibers for use in manufacturing, which in 1899 were $20,290,727 in value, were in 1898, $13,446,186, and in 1897, $12,336,318.

"Sponging" Made Easy

ONE of the worst stumbling blocks in the path of the amateur dressmaker—or indeed, that of the professional, often—is the difficulty of properly shrinking certain materials before they are suitable to be fashioned into wearing apparel. This operation of shrinking or sponging, as it is termed by tailors, is essential whenever broadcloths, ladies' cloths, or fine flannels are employed, in order to prevent future spotting, cockling, or shrinking from rain or dampness.

Have you never thought, when you have seen Bridget taking the half dried wash from the clothesline on "blue Monday" that, perhaps, you might borrow a suggestion from her work? Then again, are not clothes left out upon the line over night thoroughly and evenly dampened by morning? What, pray, is there to prevent taking your full length of new cloth out to this same clothesline some night after darkness sets in, when the air is damp, but no rain threatens, and allowing it to remain hanging therefrom, securely fastened with clothespins, until the following morning? Thieves might possibly make way with your new gown, or the posts of the line might be troublesome, but putting these possible obstacles into the background, what is the objection, if you can rejoice in a long, straight rope or wire line? The following morning the sun will, at an early hour, place the cloth in exactly the proper state for easy pressing—for the material may be brought into the house when at any desired state of dampness or dryness. Then, by keeping the unpressed portion smoothly folded, so that it will remain as damp as is required, the cloth may be ironed quickly and easily, and without flurry or nervous strain.

Then again, should you be so unfortunate as to be the owner of a gown which was made from unsponged material, and it should be spotted by rain, do not throw it aside. Take off the belt; rip the gathers, and hang it out over night the same way. In the morning the fabric will be dampened evenly, and the spots will not be so conspicuous, and will probably not show at all, for the surface of the cloth will then be all alike. Remember, though, that the garment will be considerably shorter after its bath of midnight dew. The shrinkage which should have been permitted before the material was made up, will now take advantage of the situation, and quite a good "let down" from the waistband will probably be found necessary. Such is the result of personal experiment and experience. Try it, and avoid the tailor's bill! —Good Housekeeping.

Notes of the World's Progress

A WELL DEVELOPED PROTEST IS being made by a few influential newspapers against manufactured news supplied by correspondents of the Associated Press, particularly those abroad whose duty it is to furnish American readers with news of European and Asiatic happenings. The protest is directed particularly against the artificial interview industry, which affords the correspondent an opportunity to speculate and surmise, while pretending to give the views of "one whose name is withheld for diplomatic reasons," or "a prominent official," etc., etc. The public want news, reliable news, but does not take stock in interviews which bear the ear marks of fiction. Protest by papers against padded dispatches will be heartily endorsed by the reading public. The fact should not be lost sight of that the value of a newspaper in the eyes of the public hinges on its veracity and integrity, and the paper which does not possess these essentials is better unpublished.

A PROPOS OF NEWSPAPERS, CORRESPONDENTS in the Philippines have a grievance which has assumed such proportions that some sort of official explanation is in order. It is charged that a most rigid censorship is maintained by General Otis, and nothing is permitted to be sent out without careful blue penciling, which process expunges all parts of the dispatch which reflect in any way on the management of the war. The Cuban campaign was an illustration of how ambitious and energetic reporters may gain by revelation or inspiration a knowledge of military affairs sufficiently great to enable them to advise the commanding general what he should do, and criticise him severely if he does not abide by their counsel, and General Otis may perhaps be excused for holding the reportorial contingent in check.

BUT IT IS ENTIRELY WITHIN THE rights of the public to know what is going on, and be advised of reverses as well as success. When General Weyler's type-writer was in operation, wonderful tales of Spanish valor were common, but the weird cable last week from Manila that a small force of Americans drove 2,500 Filipinos from the field, inflicting a loss of 200 killed and wounded, while the American loss was two killed and several slightly wounded, indicates the presence of a censor whose ability is second only to the one employed in Cuba. One reason advanced by General Otis for the censorship is to prevent the publication of news which would give aid or comfort to the enemy, by making known the movements or prospective movements of troops. So long as such information simply is withheld, there will be no ground for just complaint, but the censor would be well employed in suppressing exaggerations as well.

A MOVEMENT WHICH WILL MEET with universal approval is that which is fostered by the National Consumer's League. The organization had its inception nine years ago in New York city, and was the outgrowth of a realization by a number of women that conditions of saleswomen in local department stores should be improved. The object was to bring about a betterment in accommodations for saleswomen, and secure for them living wages. Persistent effort in organizing sentiment and discrimination among buyers, resulted in much desired reforms in New York.

WHEN THE MOVEMENT SPREAD TO Massachusetts, it was found that the standard required by the league in New York city was already maintained, owing to State laws, so attention was turned to manufacturers rather than retailers. Sweat shop products made in New York, for example, were placed on sale in Boston, and this led the league to plan the adoption of a label to be placed on all goods turned out by manufacturers where the standard of conditions demanded by the league obtained. The extent to which the proposed label will be used will depend upon the demands of customers, and this will naturally be greatest where the league is most active.

IN A CURRENT MAGAZINE ARTICLE, a writer named Nimmo presents an argument, supported by figures, to prove that the Nicaraguan canal, if constructed, would not be profitable as an investment. Ex-Senator Warner Miller, of New York, president of the Maritime Canal Company, which proposes to build the canal, is free to insinuate that the article from the pen of Mr. Nimmo was inspired by the lobby maintained by the trans-continental railroads. Mr. Miller states that he can let the contract for construction to responsible contractors who will furnish adequate bond, for $100,000,000. The fixed charges would amount to $4,000,000 annually, which would be met if commerce through the canal amounted to two million tons. As from sixteen to eighteen million tons pass through the Suez canal annually, it would seem that the Nicaraguan company would be able to declare a good dividend. Besides bringing New York 2,000 miles nearer than London or Liverpool to the markets of China and Japan north of Hong Kong, it would mean a rapid development of the immense natural resources of the entire Pacific Coast.

RUSSIA IS ABOUT TO ABANDON Siberian exile. What form of punishment will replace it has not been decided, but the whole matter is under consideration by an imperial commission. The reasons for this decision are similar to those which actuated England fifty years ago in the case of Australia. Russia several years since awakened to the fact that the vast territory known as Siberia could be used for purposes other than as a prison for criminals and political offenders; that it was rich in natural resources, and in some sections a most desirable place of residence. For several centuries Siberia has been a prison of unknown horrors. It was Mr. Kennon who first made its darkest side visible through the publication of his book. Now this will be changed. Colonization will be encouraged, and the country divested of its terrors.

WHEN THE TRANSPORT "McPHERSON" arrived at San Juan with a cargo of supplies for suffering and starving victims of the hurricane which devastated Puerto Rico, the native stevedores went on a strike, and refused to unload the vessel unless their wages were doubled. Fortunately for themselves they attempted no violence on the volunteers who performed the work twenty-four hours later. It is not to be presumed that the rag-tag element such as composes the San Juan stevedores fairly represents the personnel of Puerto Rican natives, but it is to be sincerely regretted that in the distribution of food the worthy cannot be distinguished from the unworthy. Reports from the interior of the island are in effect that laborers, relying on the charity of the United States, have deserted the fields and plantations in such numbers that agricultural operations are seriously interfered with. Planters of standing urge the government to exact labor on public works from all able-bodied men in exchange for food and clothing.

IN GAINING TITLE TO SPANISH POSSESSIONS in the Orient, the United States acquired the Sulu group, consisting of 160 small islands lying south of the Philippines, and having a population of about 17,000, largely Moros. The Sultan of Sulu has not opposed American sovereignty, but in negotiating a treaty, has insisted on certain rights. The treaty as now proposed, guarantees non-interference with the religious customs of the Moros, promises American protection, and provides for American sovereignty.

THAT CLAUSE OF THE TREATY referring to non-interference with religious customs is probably not intended, at least according to American construction, to mean that no effort will be made by religious bodies to effect a reformation of the morals of the Moros. According to accounts, the Moro code permits a laxity which would be hardly creditable to or tolerable in a land protected by the American flag. Polygamy and slavery are recognized institutions, but a compromise in the latter is offered by the Sultan, whereby a slave can purchase his freedom by payment of his market value to his owner.

The News of the Church

Chicago

Wm. Edward McLaren, D.D., D.C.L., Bishop

The Rev. Dr. Rushton has been spending a week with the Rev. Dr. Clinton Locke, at Wequetonsing, Little Traverse Bay, Mich.

The congregation of All Saints', Ravenswood, is at present worshipping in the guild hall, the extensive additions, to be completed by October, necessitating this temporary change.

The Rev. T. D. Phillips returned on Saturday from a three weeks' visit to old friends, ex-pupils and relatives, in Toronto, Ottawa, Montreal, Three Rivers, and Quebec. While in Ottawa, he preached in the vice-regal chapel, the services in which as a mission he opened in 1867.

The Bishop left, a little over a fortnight ago by rail, for Toronto, thence to Montreal and Quebec, in each of which cities he spent a few days. After which he departed for his Point Pleasant, N. J., cottage. He will return to Chicago about Sept. 15th.

St. Paul's, Kankakee

The building of the new St. Paul's church, Kankakee, is progressing rapidly. The cornerstone will be laid on Tuesday, Sept. 5th, in the afternoon, for which day, also, the quarterly meeting of the Southern convocation will be summoned by the dean, the Rev. Dr. Phillips.

New York

Henry Codman Potter, D.D., LL.D., Bishop

The almonry of St. Thomas, in memory of Joseph W. Harper, has just been enlarged by the addition of a new story.

At Grace church, the Rev. Wm. R. Huntington, D.D., D.C.L., rector, all seats are declared free at services held during the summer season.

At the church of the Archangel, the Rev. Geo. S. Pratt, rector, Dr. James H. Canfield, the newly appointed librarian of Columbia University, is assisting at the services now being held in the crypt chapel of the cathedral of St. John the Divine.

Flourishing Boys' Club

At St. Bartholomew's parish house, new baths have been added to the floor used for the Boys' Club. Three evenings of the week the average attendance has been over 100 boys. The membership exceeds 700 boys.

Many Enjoy Outings

At the church of the Heavenly Rest, the Rev. D. Parker Morgan, D.D., rector, the fresh air work of the present season is providing for about 550 at "The Rest," Copake, N. Y. The cost of this summer work is about $2,000.

Floating Hospital Damaged

While moored at its dock, Aug. 14th, the steamer "Emma Abbott," the floating hospital of St. John's Guild, was damaged by a passing barge, necessitating repairs which take the boat temporarily out of commission. The barge "Currie," has been secured, so that the work of the guild will not be interrupted.

Gifts for St. Michael's

At St. Michael's church, the Rev. John P. Peters, D.D., Ph.D., rector, there has been given by Mrs. and Miss Penniston, a beautiful chalice. A covering for the chancel rail has been provided, and the Altar Guild has supplied candles for the two altars of the church. The same guild has repaired the processional cross for the choir.

Parish Reception

At St. George's church, the Rev. Wm. S. Rainsford, D.D., rector, a parish reception was held Aug. 14th, and was largely attended, notwithstanding the warm season of the year. The cost of the additions now making at the parish house of St. George's church, and already noted in the columns of THE LIVING CHURCH, is likely to be about $12,000.

Fresh-Air Work

At the chapel of the Comforter, the Rev. James Sheerin, vicar, the fresh-air work provides for the care of about 150 adults and children at the Edgewater creche, with about 50 children sent to the country for a week, by the Children's Aid Society, and 75 at various localities, some through the kindness of the Tribune Fresh-Air Fund. Day excursions are also provided to a number.

Work of Calvary Parish

At Calvary church, the Rev. J. Lewis Parks, D.D., rector, the fresh-air work for the summer is being conducted at an expense of $2 500. During the hot days, the ice-water fountains of the church, chapel, and mission, are a source of blessing to thousands of passers-by. The Flower Mission of the parish supplies flowers twice a week for the sick and suffering, and poor children stifled in the hot tenement houses.

Parishes to Consolidate

There is a movement on foot looking to the consolidation of the parishes of Christ church and St. Mark's church, Tarrytown. The edifices, one of which is closely associated with the memory of Washington Irving, are not far apart. The rector of St. Mark's, the Rev. Arnold H. Redding, having resigned and gone abroad, a proposition is made to sell both buildings, and put up a fine new church, to be supported by a united and strong congregation.

The Church of the Intercession has begun repairs, having, after some delay, adjusted its difficulties with the insurance companies for the damages caused by the fire some months ago. The parish work has gone on uninterruptedly, and services have been maintained in the chapel. The repairs will include entire redecoration of the interior, the rebuilding of the organ, replacing of a stained glass window in the western transept, and refurnishing of the chancel. The rector, the Rev. L. A. Schwab, is now on vacation in Connecticut, and services are in charge of the Rev. G. A. Bartow.

New Summer Home

The new summer home of Grace church, at New Canaan, Conn., is called Grace House-in-the-Fields. In addition to the original gift of $25 000 by Mrs. Anchmuty, $10,000 has been contributed by two friends of the enterprise. These supplementary benefactors have paid for the land (148 acres) and for the water supply, to secure which last it was necessary to sink an artesian well. Through the generous kindness of Mr. and Mrs. Wm. Lanman Bull, a chapel has been arranged for, to match in architecture the other buildings. This last gift is particularly valuable, as the home was two miles distant from the nearest place of worship.

Serious Loss by Fire

The edifice of St. Peter's church, Westchester, the Rev. Frank M. Clendenin, D.D., rector, was seriously damaged by fire, Aug. 16th. The loss, amounting to about $60,000, will be more than covered by an insurance of $100,000. All the rear part of the church is burned beyond repair, and will need entire rebuilding. The famous old lecturn Bible, which weighs about 75 pounds, and has been saved several times from fire, was saved again. The fireman who saved it, did so at the serious risk of his life, and found it already ablaze. The Communion service of silver, presented by Queen Anne, and which was kept in a safe in the church, was also rescued, as it has been from previous fires. The fire was discovered by smoke issuing from windows erected in 1895, in memory of Lady Charlotte Zoega Franlane. Many public spirited citizens at once made effort to save pictures and other historic relics. The fine steeple clock, presented by several parishioners, at a cost of $2,000, was destroyed. So were the gallery organ, presented by Mrs. Annie Caswell, in memory of her father, Wm. Caswell, at a cost of $10,000, and the chancel organ; presented by Mrs. John C. Furman, at a cost of $5 000. All the interior part of the church was badly wrecked, and the roof burned through. The cause of the fire has not been discovered, though it is thought it may have been imperfect insulation of electric light wires. Singularly, this parish has suffered four times from fire. Notwithstanding the disaster, an ordination service appointed to be held Sunday, Aug. 20th, in the church, was duly held, the service taking place in the chapel, where Bishop Seymour, of Springfield, acting for the Bishop of the diocese, advanced the Rev. John Tilley, Jr., to the priesthood. Mr. Tilley has been for some time associated with Dr. Clendenin in Church work at St. Peter's.

Pennsylvania

Ozi William Whitaker, D.D., LL.D., Bishop

Bishop Whitaker, who sailed from New York 29th ult. for Rotterdam, has been heard from. He describes the trip across as a very pleasant one. With Mrs. Whitaker, he at once took passage on a Rhine steamer direct for Switzerland, in which republic he will spend several weeks.

Since the resignation of the Rev. H. S. Getz as rector, and the withdrawal of the Rev. John S. Bunting, senior curate of the church of the Holy Apostles, Philadelphia, there only remains the Rev. William S. Neill (perpetual deacon) to minister to the congregation. In this emergency the Rev. Dr. Herman L. Duhring has consented to take charge until a rector has been chosen and accepted the office.

Death of a Prominent Educator

Henry Hobart Brown, principal of the Delancey school, Philadelphia, died at the Bryn Mawr hospital on the 17th inst., from blood poisoning. Mr. Brown was a son of the late Rev. Dr. Henry Brown, whose decease was noted in these columns July, 1898. He was a man of great scholarly attainments, of strong personality.

Days of Intercession for Sunday Schools

The executive committee of the American Church Sunday School Institute invites the clergy, superintendents, teachers, and friends of Sunday schools, to unite in observing Sunday, Oct. 15th, and the day following—being the days suggested by the Church of England Sunday School Institute—for special intercession in behalf of Sunday schools.

Notable Missionary Gathering

The names of the missionaries participating in the great farewell service at the Church Missions House, to be held September 1st, are the following: For Japan—The Rev. J. Lindsay Patton and wife, returning after vacation, the Rev. John C. Ambler (re appointed) and wife, Miss Emma Williamson, returning after vacation, the Rev. Allan W. Cooke (Nashotah Seminary), and the Rev. Messrs. H. St. George Tucker, John Armisted Welbourn, and James Jeffries Chapman (all of the Theological Seminary of Virginia); Miss A. Theodora Wall of Dorchester, Mass., and Miss Clara J. Neely, of Portsmouth, Va., both of whom have been trained in the Church Training and Deaconess' House, Philadelphia; together with the Rev. Mr. Sakai. For China—The Rev. Benjamin L. Ansell and the Rev. Cameron F. McKae (both of the Theological Seminary of Virginia), and Miss Eliza L. McCook, of Hartford, Conn.

St. Mark's Jubilee

As was stated in THE LIVING CHURCH of March 18th, the 50th anniversary of the opening of St. Mark's church will be celebrated on All Saints' Day, although the actual date of that initial service is Oct. 21, 1849. The arrangements for the celebration will not be completed until the return of the rector, the Rev. Dr. A. G. Mort-mer, from Europe; he is not expected until October. During these 50 years there have been: Baptisms, 4,012; confirmed, 2,191; present number of communicants in the parish (including St. Mary's and St. Michael's chapels), 1,501. The total receipts for the past 37 years aggregate $1,334,402 08. Dividing this time into periods of seven years, the last septennate shows an increase over the previous one of 326 Baptisms, 204 confirmed, 300 communicants, and $105,142 20 of income. The name St. Michael's has recently been given to the mission at 17th and Kuter sts., which has been in successful operation for many years past. It sends one lay delegate to the Southwest convocation. St. Mark's is a very progressive and successful parish. It is one of the churches where the Holy Eucharist is offered every day in the year, except Good Friday, and also where the children of the parish school are catechised daily. All the "six points" of Catholic ritual are observed at St. Mark's, and also in her chapel of St. Mary's (colored congregation).

Death of a Distinguished Layman

Charles Janeway Stille, LL.D., president of the Historical Society of Pennsylvania, ex-provost and professor of belles lettres, English language and literature in the University of Pennsylvania, departed this life on the 11th inst., at Atlantic City, N. J., of heart disease, aged nearly 80 years. He had been gradually failing, and went to the seashore in June, hoping for a restoration to health. He was a native of Philadelphia, where he was born Sept. 23d, 1819, and was the fifth in descent from Olaf Stille, who accompanied William Prentz, the first governor of the Swedish colony on the Delaware, in 1641. On his mother's side he is descended from the Rev. Johann Wagner, a co-laborer with Muhlenberg in Pennsylvania. He was educated at the academical department of the University of Pennsylvania, Edge Hill School, Princeton, N. J., and graduated from Yale College in 1839. With two other prominent Churchmen, the late Horace Binney, Jr., and Robert M. Lewis who still survives, he organized the Woman's Branch of the Philadelphia Associates, and was one of the chief promoters of the movement which culminated in the great Sanitary Fair of 1864, where over $1,000,000 were gathered during its two weeks' continuance. In May, 1866, Dr. Stille was elected to a professorship in the university, and two years later, when the late Rev. Dr. D. R. Goodwin resigned his position as provost to become dean of the Philadelphia Divinity School, Dr. Stille was unanimously elected his successor; and his alma mater, Yale, conferred the degree of LL.D. on her distinguished alumnus. In the same year Dr. Stille was made "John Welsh centennial professor of history and English literature" at the university, in which he continued one year after his resignation as provost. During his tenure of this latter office, the gifts to the university aggregated $2,000,000. After severing his connection with that institution he published, 1882, several important works.

Albany

William Crowell Doane, D.D., LL.D., Bishop

The Rev. A. W. Mann spent Sunday, Aug. 13th, at Potsdam. At 5 P. M., a "combined service" was held at Trinity church, the Rev. Dr. Kirby, rector. It was the first service of the kind ever held in the place, and was well attended.

The baptistry of St. Paul's church, Troy, the Rev. Edgar A. Enos, D.D., rector, has been completed by the addition of a beautiful memorial window. The entire baptistry is a memorial to Mr. and Mrs. J. M. Warren, the father and mother of Mrs. John I. Thompson, and is given by Mrs. Thompson. The window is in commemoration of the work of the Guild of St. Elizabeth during the restoration of the church. It was made by Tiffany, and represents Christ blessing little children. In all, there are 11 figures, and each one is worked out with detail and finish that is strikingly noticeable. It was dedicated in the early part of August, by the Rev. James A. Smith, curate of the church. The Guild of St. Elizabeth was present in a body. Following the service, the members were served a cold collation in the Martha Memorial House, and were the guests of Mr. and Mrs. John I. Thompson.

Outing for Invalid Children

Eighty little invalids from the Child's Hospital, Albany, are spending the summer at St. Christina's Home, Saratoga, which was, Thursday, Aug. 3rd, the scene of a gay fete and musical, under the auspices of the people of Saratoga's fashionable cottage and hotel society. Beside the Albany children, there are half as many more little inmates of the home, in charge of Sister Katrina and her assistants of the Sisterhood of the Holy Child Jesus, and all these 116 are suffering from deformity or disease. St. Christina's Home is embowered in sylvan beauty, and on the lawn an assembly of fully 500 people fitted from table to table.

Missouri

Daniel Sylvester Tuttle, D.D., Bishop

Death of Mrs. Tuttle

A deep affliction has fallen upon the Bishop of Missouri in the death of his active and devoted wife, Mrs. Harriet M. Tuttle, occurring, too, at the time of his absence in the Far West. Mrs. Tuttle had for some time been subject to attacks of jaundice, etc., and returning a few days since from a visit to her married daughter, in Cincinnati, she entered St. Luke's Hospital, in St. Louis, in order to undergo an operation which it was expected would completely restore her health. This was successfully performed at 8 o'clock on Friday morning, Aug. 18th, and until 12 M. of that day, promised to result most favorably, but soon thereafter came a reaction, which culminated in death at 2 P. M. The Bishop, meanwhile, was spending his vacation in his former missionary jurisdiction, and, not apprehending any resort to surgery, or a crisis in his wife's condition, was enjoying the cordial reception everywhere accorded him, and rejoicing in the growth of the churches which he had been largely instrumental in planting more than 20 years ago, only to be suddenly arrested by the startling news of her death, when he could only reach home after two or three days of continuous travel. The shock of Mrs. Tuttle's death is felt throughout the community, and is the cause of wide-spread sorrow.

Fond du Lac

Charles Chapman Grafton, D.D., Bishop

A Generous Gift

Through the generosity of an Eastern lady, by whom Bishop Grafton was given $50,000 to dispose of at his discretion, the cathedral parish has been given $25,000, and a like amount has been bestowed on Grafton Hall, the diocesan school for girls. The gift to the cathedral will wipe out the indebtedness on this beautiful edifice, and establish a permanent endowment fund. The parish being free from debt, arrangements are already under way for the consecration of the cathedral, next June, on the 25th anniversary of the organization of the diocese. The money given to Grafton Hall will be devoted to the erection of an addition to the property, doubling the student capacity.

Central New York

F. D. Huntington, D.D., LL.D., Bishop

The Rev. Horace T. Owen is in charge of St. Paul's, Antwerp, and the Rev. A. W. Allen serves the mission at New York Mills and Gethsemane parish, Westmoreland. The Rev. Mr. Bennett is in charge of Christ church, Forestport.

Meeting of Convocation

The first meeting of the 4th district convocation, for business only, for this fiscal year, was held in St. Andrew's church, Utica, the Rev. J. Winslow Clark, rector, on July 25th, the feast of St. James. A bountiful lunch was served by the ladies of the parish in the Sunday school room. At 2 P. M., the convocation was called to order by the dean, the Rev. Oliver Owen. The report of the treasurer was read and approved. The committee on assessments and stipends made their report, which was adopted, with a few minor exceptions. The Rev. Wm. Cooke was elected treasurer, and the Rev. J. W. Clark, secretary, for the ensuing year. The Rev. E. H. Coley was elected clerical member of the Board of Managers of diocesan missions, and Mr. William Pierrepont White, lay member. Convocation then adjourned till the last Tuesday in October.

Long Island

Abram N. Littlejohn, D.D., LL.D., Bishop

The people of Zion parish, Douglaston, were delightfully entertained by an illustrated and instructive lecture by the Rev. A. A. Brockway, of New York. The subject was "Norway and the midnight sun." This is the second lecture the Rev. Mr. Brockway has delivered in this parish within six months. The proceeds were for the new church heater fund.

Plans for New Church

Plans for a very handsome edifice, to replace St. James' church, Brooklyn, have been accepted by the vestry, and work will soon be begun. The design selected was submitted by architect Herbert R. Brewster. It is in the early English Gothic, strong and massive in effect. The interior is consistent with the exterior design in treatment, being cruciform, and having nave, transepts, choir, and sanctuary. The apse is to be surrounded by an ambulatory, with which it is connected by means of open arches. Adjoining the ambulatory on either side are the vestry and choir-rooms, also the morning chapel, which may be independently entered by means of the vestry porch on St. James' Place, the choir rooms also being provided with independent entrance. The main entrances to the church will be through spacious vestibules in the large tower, and at the foot of the east aisle. The large tower will be a prominent and imposing feature of the new edifice. The interior finish is to be of quartered oak, with massive nave columns and arches, and richly groined ceiling, finished in soft amber tones; and the tracery windows being glazed with shaded opalescent glass of similar color, a soft, sunny effect of lighting will be produced, regardless of fair or cloudy skies. Instead of the usual brick and stone, the material for the walls of the new building will consist of granite concrete, combined with twisted iron rods. The architect has adopted a system of ventilation which will render open doors and windows unnecessary, while providing an even temperature and pure air throughout the building. The new church will be lighted by combination gas and electric lights, those of the chancel being so arranged that the direct light cannot be seen from the body of the church. It is hoped that the building will be ready for occupancy by next Easter. When completed, it will cost about $70,000.

The old frame building in use so many years has been moved to one side of the lot, and will be used until the new church is ready. The Rev. Dr. Charles Homer has been rector of St. James' church for more than 25 years.

Western Michigan

George De Normandie Gillespie, D.D., Bishop

A Diocesan Loss

The diocese has met with a great loss in the death of the Hon. David G. Robinson who has been treasurer of the Board of Missions during the past 23 years. His term as vestryman in Emmanuel church, Hastings, corresponds with the life of the parish. Mr. Robinson was in his 89th year, but was actively engaged in business up to a few days before his decease. The Rev. W. W. Taylor, of Philadelphia, a former rector, and Bishop Gillespie, had charge of the funeral, which was from the parish church.

Delaware

Leighton Coleman, D.D., LL.D., Bishop
St. Barnabas' Church Consecrated

The Bishop recently consecrated the new church of St. Barnabas, Marshalltown, which replaces that destroyed by fire on last Christmas Day. The sermon was preached by the Rev. K. J. Hammond. Other clergy present and taking part in the services, were Archdeacon G. C. Hall, the Revs. H. Ashton Henry, M. B. Dunlap, and H. W. Cunningham. The priest in-charge, the Rev. E. K. Miller, presented a class for Confirmation at the afternoon service. It speaks well for the activity of both pastor and flock that within a period of six months a new and well-appointed church building should have replaced the former one.

New Church at Delmar

A new church is in process of construction at Delmar, a town of rising importance in the extreme south of the diocese. The work here is under the care of the Rev. C. N. Spalding, D.D., the rector of Laurel. The Bishop a short time ago laid the corner stone of this new edifice, the occasion proving a most interesting and encouraging one to the community at large, as well as to those more nearly concerned. The new mission will take the name of All Saints. Addresses were delivered by Bishop Coleman, the Rev. E. K. Miller, and the priest-in-charge.

Lawn Meeting at Bishopstead

To be reminded of our duty in the great cause of missions by a public gathering at a period of the year when the heat is most severe, is not, perhaps, the most usual thing, but it is the Delaware way. When Fr. Huntington spoke at the lawn missionary meeting at Bishopstead a few weeks ago, missionary zeal was fully aroused. Nothing could have been more interesting than Bishop Talbot's telling address, so full of enthusiasm for his new missionary work in Central Pennsylvania, and yet so full of tender feeling for those left behind in the great North-western fields, or more stirring than the Bishop's closing address. Before and after the addresses hymns were sung and the Bishop recited appropriate collects. Refreshments were served after the meeting.

Immanuel Church, Highlands,

the Rev. Kensey J. Hammond, rector, is undergoing extensive enlargements. From a letter and statement recently issued, we gather that the affairs of the parish, both spiritual and temporal, are in a very healthy condition.

Milwaukee

Isaac Lea Nicholson, D.D., Bishop

The Ven. Archdeacon E. P. Wright, D.D., will spend September in Superior, where he will conduct the services at the church of the Redeemer, for the rector, the Rev. Chas. H. H. Bloor, who will be absent on a visit to England.

The Rev. Seth M. Wilcox has accepted a call to the rectorship of Grace church, Boone, diocese of Iowa, and already entered upon his duties.

Dallas

Alexander Chas. Garrett, D.D., LL.D., Bishop
Service for Missions

The diocesan board of missions held a public meeting at Fort Worth, Aug. 8th, at St. Andrew's parish house. Bishop Garrett presided. The Rev. John B. Gible, of Denison, secretary of the diocesan board of missions, delivered an address on the subject, "The duties of the diocese and board of missions." An address was also delivered by the Rev. J. O. Miller, of McKinney, on the subject, "Missions in towns." The Rev. W. K. Lloyd, of Paris, read a paper on "Church extension in new places." The last address was by Bishop Garrett, of Dallas, who spoke on the subject, "The work." The address was short, but eloquent. He referred briefly to the one great sin of unbelief, and reviewed at some length the work which had been accomplished in the Dallas diocese under his direction during the past quarter of a century. A conference between the Woman's Auxiliary and the clergy was held the following day. Papers and addresses were delivered by Mrs. Theodore Wallace, of Dallas, president of the diocesan branch of the Woman's Auxiliary, and Mesdames Poole and Ramage, and Bishop Garrett. Lunch was served by the members of the parish at the rectory.

The Archbishops' Decision on Incense and Lights

On the thirty-first of last month, in the guard-room of Lambeth palace, the Archbishop of Canterbury promulgated the formal judgment on certain questions of ritual which had been submitted to the Archbishops of Canterbury and York. We give in full the text of their judgment:

The questions put before us at the present time are two: The lawfulness of the liturgical use of incense, and the lawfulness of carrying lights in processions in public worship of the Church of England.

THE MEANING OF THE ORNAMENTS RUBRIC

There is no direction in the Book of Common Prayer either enjoining or authorizing either of these practices, but it is argued that they are practically sanctioned by the Ornaments Rubric prefixed to the order for Morning Prayer, and that it is consequently this rubric that we have to interpret. It seems most convenient first to interpret it as it stands, and then to consider whether any circumstances tend to contravene or modify this interpretation. The ornaments of which it speaks are limited by two phrases. They are "the ornaments to be used by the ministers at all times of their ministrations," and they are to be "such as were in use in the Church of England by the authority of Parliament in the second year of the reign of King Edward VI." Ornaments which do not fall within both these limitations are outside the purview of the rubric altogether. Any ornament which is not required at any time of the ministrations of the ministers, and any ornament which was not in use by authority of Parliament in the second year of the reign of King Edward VI. is not an ornament to which the rubric applies. To deal, therefore, with the first of these limitations, it is necessary to examine the meaning of the word "ministration." The ministration of the minister is contained in and described by the Book of Common Prayer. It is there that we find what is the form to be observed in all the offices of public worship. Every clergyman is required by the 36th Canon to use the form "in the Book of Common Prayer prescribed, and none other." This prevents the insertion of any additional prayer or ceremony without special authority, and the only authority which can bind or authorize the clergyman to make any variation whatever from what is contained in the Book, is either an act of Convocation legalized where necessary by Parliament, or the order of the Crown, issued with the advice and consent of the Metropolitan, under the Act of 1559, or a direction by the Ordinary under the Uniformity Act Amendment Act of 1872. Against this it is contended that the Prayer Book of 1549 contains ceremonies which are not in the Prayer Book of 1552, and that since omission is not prohibition, these omitted ceremonies are still lawful under the last mentioned Act. Under the latter Act, whether omission is prohibition, it is not necessary for us to consider; but prohibition is prohibition, and nothing can be clearer than the words used in the Act of 1559 prohibiting the use of any ceremony not ordered in the Book:

"And further be it enacted by the Queen's Highness with the assent of the Lords and Commons in this present Parliament assembled and by authority of the same that all and singular ministers in any cathedral or parish church, or other place within this realm of England and Wales and the marches of the same or other the Queen's dominions shall from and after the feast of the divinity of St. John the Baptist next coming be bound to say and use the matins, Evensong, and celebration of the Lord's Supper and administration of each of the sacraments and all their common and open prayer in such order and form as is mentioned in the said Book so authorized by Parliament in the said fifth and sixth year of the reign of King Edward VI. with one alteration or addition on certain license to be used on every Sunday in the year and the form of the Litany altered and corrected, and two sentences only added in the delivery of the sacraments to the communicants and none other or otherwise."

And the closing section of the Act still further confirms this by saying:

"And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid that all laws, statutes and ordinances wherein or whereby any other service administration of the Sacraments or common prayer is limited, established, or set forth to be used within this realm, or any other of the Queen's dominions or countries, shall from henceforth be utterly void and of non-effect."

The words "none other or otherwise" in the first of these quotations are clearly meant to exclude all variations. It is sometimes urged that the Act of 1559, not having previously received the assent of the Convocations, has no authority from the Church, and is, therefore, not binding on the consciences of the clergy; but though it was not possible at the moment to give the Convocations their proper place, yet the Church fully accepted the Act at the time, and its authority is never questioned. In regard to the particular matter now under consideration the 36th Canon requires from every clergyman, and every clergyman has ever since made, and still every clergyman makes, a solemn promise containing the same words, that he will "use the form in the said book prescribed and none other"; and in the manuscript Prayer Book signed by Convocation on December 26, 1661, and then presented to the King, the Act of 1559 was set forth at full length in the beginning of the book, and is thus formally adopted by the authority of the Church. It is quite true that there may be variations which are so brief, so long in use, so unimportant, that a bishop would be justified in refusing to allow a clergyman to be prosecuted because of his use. No authority has been found for the short sentences which in many churches the people are accustomed to say or sing immediately before and after the reading of the Gospel in the Communion Office. There is no authority for the practice of the people saying the General Thanksgiving aloud with the minister; there is no authority for shortening the exhortation which the minister is to read when giving notice of the Holy Communion. These practices are probably in strictness all illegal, but no bishop would be wise in allowing a prosecution for such unimportant deviations from the strict letter of the law. This, however, cannot be said of the introduction of any ceremony which is conspicuous, not sanctioned by long continued custom in our Church, and of such a nature as to change the general character and aspect of the service.

LITURGICAL USE OF INCENSE

It is urged that the Act was not generally obeyed at the time when it was passed, and was probably never intended to be so obeyed, and instances are given of the use of incense in worship at that time, and for long afterwards. With regard to such instances, it is to be remarked that the time was a time of great excitement. The whole country was in a feverish condition. Elizabeth and her advisers could not be sure that insurrection and civil war might not begin at any moment. It was necessary to act without delay. Elizabeth herself would have preferred to bring back the First Prayer Book of Edward VI., but she did not feel sure that the country would bear this, and all through her reign, in spite of her despotic character, she showed herself steadily determined to have her people with her. It was impossible to consult the convocations. The reign of Mary had made them, and especially their leaders, the bishops, untrustworthy for the purpose in hand. The end was, as usual in England, a compromise. The Second Book of Edward VI., slightly modified, was taken as the Book of Common Prayer, the ornaments of an earlier period were revived, but only until the sovereign might make some different order, and the Crown was empowered with the consent of the then Ecclesiastical Commissioners or of the Archbishop of Canterbury to order additional rites and ceremonies at discretion. The English are almost always ready to settle agitating disputes by a compromise, but they are not always quick to see what the compromise means. There can be no doubt that the Act was imperfectly obeyed. Practices which were no longer lawful under its provisions were still maintained here and there. Archbishop Sandys, in his well known letter, goes so far as to say that he interprets the Act as one that would not really be enforced. There seems to have been a certain amount of conscious, and still more unconscious, disobedience. But in spite of all this, the precise and clear statements in the Act gradually prevailed, and forbidden ceremonies gradually disappeared. In its application to the use of incense, the law was obscured by the fact that, side by side with the liturgical use, another use had always been common which it was not the intention of the rulers or of the Legislature to interfere with. There was nothing to prevent the use of incense for the purpose of sweetening the atmosphere of a church wherever and whenever such sweetening was needed, and instances of this use can be found long after the Act of Elizabeth, and were produced before us at the hearing of the case. But such instances have no bearing whatever on the lawfulness of the liturgical use, but they explain why in the case of incense, the law was more slowly understood, because it was so natural to confuse the two uses with one another. There are many instances of what is called the fumigatory as distinguished from the liturgical use. George Herbert used incense to sweeten his church. There is no liturgical use in this, and yet he is frequently quoted as one of those who used incense in worship. When all these instances are struck out, the number of cases in which incense was used in worship is utterly insufficient as evidence to show any widespread interpretation of the law as permitting the retention of the old usage in spite of the plain words of the statute. Further, it must be remembered that the Church has never spoken of incense as an evil thing. There were some expressions in the homilies which have that character, but the homilies are hortatory rather than imperative, and have never been taken as having high authority on points of doctrine or ritual. Incense was excluded from public worship not as an evil thing, but as unsuited to the needs of the day. There are clearly three reasons present to the minds of the then Church authorities for its exclusion. First, they felt the need of greater simplicity. The services were too complicated. The rule that the services should be understood by the people required that they should not only be in English, but that they should not be overloaded with symbolism making a complete understanding difficult. Symbolism, kept within strict limits, helps the understanding, but symbolism may easily be pushed to lengths which divert the attention from what the symbolism is intended to teach to the symbolism itself. The liturgical use of incense was described on the part of those who advocated it before us as very complicated in its detail. It might have been well under quite other circumstances to have simplified the ceremonial whilst retaining it, but it is generally found easier and more effective to get rid of the danger contained in anything of this kind by disuse than by modification. Secondly, the liturgical use of incense was specially connected with the Office for the Holy Communion, in relation to which many serious errors have arisen, and the authorities had a strong desire to make that whole Office as nearly as it could suitably be made a precise repetition of the original institution. It was the main purpose of the then rulers of the Church to put prominently forward the supremacy of the Bible. It is clear that the more closely the ceremonial of the Eucharist was modelled on the Biblical account of the original institution the more fully was the authority of the Bible recognized. The difference between the time when the Bridegroom was with His disciples, and the time when He had departed to share His Father's throne, was enough to account for the preference of kneeling over sitting when receiving the mysterious gift, but in other respects the ritual was as nearly as it could be made a repetition of the original feast. Even the mixing of water with the wine was dropped for the same reason, for though our Lord used the wine of the Passover, which was a mixed cup, there is no record of His having mixed it afresh for the purpose of His Sacrament, nor is there any reason to believe that He did so. The mixing of the chalice as part of the ceremonial was therefore omitted, though nothing was said to prevent its being mixed beforehand. And, thirdly and lastly, they had the less hesitation in omitting incense because it was certainly not in use in the Church for at least 300 years from the Apostolic times. To get back to the earlier and purer days of Christianity, to make the primitive Church the model for the Church of England, was certainly part of the purpose which our Reformers cherished. It would have been a very strong reason for keeping incense in use could it have been shown that its use dated from Apostolic times, and passed directly from the Jewish to the Christian ritual, but the history pointed in quite another direction. And so the three chief reasons for omitting the use of incense—namely, the desire for greater simplicity, the desire for conformity to the New Testament account of the original institution of the great Sacrament, and the desire for reviving the ways of the primitive Church—converged to recommend the action which was finally taken. Yet it is right to observe that even now the liturgical use of incense is not by law permanently excluded from the Church's ritual. The section in Elizabeth's Act which allows the Crown, with the consent of the Archbishop of Canterbury, to order new ceremonies, does not forbid the inclusion of the use of incense in such new ceremonies if such are authorized. It would always be possible, if some great occasion made it suitable, for the Sovereign, with the advice of the Primate, to order a great ceremonial in which the use of incense should form a part. The question of probability need not now be raised. Many things might become probable, when our toleration of one another had risen to a higher level, which are not probable at present, but meanwhile the law requires that the clergy should wait for the action of lawful authority before bringing any additional ceremonial to form a part of public worship. The rubric is often carelessly interpreted, as if the order to use the ornaments was per se an order to use the appropriate ceremonies. But, in the first place, this interpretation makes the Act of Elizabeth contradict itself by ordering a strict adherence to the form of ceremonial prescribed in the book, and at the same time ordering the revival of a number of ceremonies of which the book says nothing. In the second place, it inverts the relation between a ceremony and an ornament by making the ceremony subordinate to the ornament, instead of the ornament being subordinate to the ceremony. The very meaning of an ornament is that it is a thing to be used for the fitting performance of a ceremony, and if no ceremony be prescribed, the so-called ornament has no place. In the third place, to order a ceremony not directly, but by ordering the use of an ornament connected with it, is without any precedent in the history of the Church. And lastly, this interpretation makes the words, "at all times of their ministrations," not merely unmeaning, but misleading. They would in that case be better away. Such an interpretation we are quite unable to adopt.

In conclusion, we are far from saying that incense in itself is an unsuitable or undesirable accompaniment to Divine worship. The injunction for its use by Divine authority in the Jewish Church would alone forbid such a conclusion. But this is not the question before us. We are not to determine what might be fitting or permissible at some other time, but whether, under the present directions of the Book of Common Prayer, the liturgical use of incense is lawful or unlawful in the Church of England, and we are obliged to come to the conclusion that the use of incense in the public worship, and as a part of that worship, is not at present enjoined nor permitted by the law of the Church of England, and it is our duty to request the clergy who use it to discontinue that use. If used at all, it must be used, in George Herbert's language, "to sweeten the church," and outside the worship of God.

PROCESSIONAL LIGHTS

It is obvious at once that precisely the same line of reasoning is applicable to the case of processions carrying lights as we have applied to the case of incense. There is no authority for such processions, and they are therefore neither enjoined nor permitted. To light up a Church for the purpose of adding to its beauty or to its dignity stands on the same footing with hanging up banners, decorating with flowers or with holly or the like. The ceremonies of carrying lights have a different character, and in this case, as in that of incense, we are obliged to request the clergy to discontinue what the law of the Church of England does not permit—the carrying of lights in procession—and in this decision we have the support of the late Archbishop Benson in his judgment in the case of the Bishop of Lincoln.

THE SECOND YEAR OF EDWARD VI.

We began by pointing out that the Ornaments Rubric limited the ornaments of which it speaks by two phrases, namely—the words "at all times of their ministrations," and the words "as were in use by authority of Parliament in the second year of the reign of King Edward VI." We have examined the first of these limitations and have concluded that it forbids the use of incense and of lights carried in procession in public worship. It is obvious that this conclusion makes it unnecessary to examine at any length the second limitation. Whether, as seems most probable, the authority of Parliament in the second year of the reign of King Edward VI. means the first Act of Uniformity, and therefore the Prayer Book of 1549, or means the immediately preceding state of the law, does not affect the arguments which we have used. The question is undeniably difficult to answer because of the anomalous rule at that time in force, whereby the operation of every Act of Parliament was made to date from the first day of the session in which it was passed, and consequently some time previously to the Royal assent. This strange rule continued until 1792, and was then abolished, and this rule would appear to carry back the first Act of Uniformity into the above named second year of King Edward VI. But it is not necessary for us to enter into this matter now, as the questions before us are sufficiently determined without reference to the point.

SUBMISSION TO EPISCOPAL AUTHORITY

In conclusion, we think it our duty to press not only on the clergy that have appeared before us, but also on all the clergy alike, to submit to episcopal authority in all such matters as these. All alike have consented to the Book of Common Prayer, and the Book of Common Prayer requires all persons not only if they doubt, but if they find that others disagree with them concerning the meaning of the directions contained in the book, to resort to the bishop of the diocese, who may, if he thinks fit, send the question to the archbishop for his decision. In order to give the fullest opportunity to any who diversely take any question of this kind to give reasons for their opinion, we suspended our decision until we had heard the matter fully and learnedly argued before us, and we have now given our decision as the Prayer Book requires us to do. We entreat the clergy, for the sake of the peace of the Church, which we all so much desire, to accept our decision thus conscientiously given in the Name of our common Master, the Supreme Head of the Church, the Lord whose commission we bear.

Editorials and Contributions

IN the passion which seems to possess some of our writers to make the way easy to the achievement of some kind of Christian unity, there is danger of reducing religion to such a minimum that it will fail to preserve the force which gives it life and power. Especially there is danger of the sacrifice of everything which has in the past been matter of conviction. Truth becomes precarious and unreal. It is a matter of agreement, not of conviction. It is no longer anything for which men would suffer martyrdom. A great writer, without intending it, for her words were meant to apply to the possibilities of Judaism, has hit the nail on the head. One of the speakers in "Daniel Deronda" is represented as expressing himself thus: "Prune it of a few useless rites and literal interpretations, and our religion is the simplest of all religions, and makes no barrier, but a union, between us and the rest of the world." The words were written many years ago, but how frequently, since the various schemes of union began to assume practical form, have we seen something similar from the promoters of such schemes. The answer is worthy of our attention: "You pluck up your religion by the roots, strip off the leaves and bark, shave off the knots, and smooth it at top and bottom; put it where you will, it will do no harm, it will never sprout." There is the fatal truth, "it will never sprout." All that ever made it worthy of the living interest of men is gone out of it. It has become their creature instead of a force from above to which they must be content to give themselves, body, soul, and spirit. A religion which is framed to meet men's wishes rather than their needs, is a religion without life.

IT is alleged that the American Church is "wanting in that which is the final test of Christianity," that "she is not a missionary Church." To our mind there is something very conventional about this view of things. The idea seems to be that "missionary work" is work presided over by the Board of Missions, and no other. In fact, in the discussions we have seen, the term seems to be almost restricted to foreign missions. It ought to be recognized that the Church as she exists in this country is in large measure a missionary institution. What is being done by the Board of Missions, important as it is, is only a small portion of the work to which the word "missionary" properly applies. Hundreds of missions are being conducted by self-denying priests in city and village, up and down the country, with little or no outside aid. It is work which is, for the most part, quite outside the sphere of the general board. There are organized dioceses which, beyond a few centres where the Church has become self-supporting, present as difficult a field as that of any missionary jurisdiction. The Church throughout a large part of the country is engaged in a purely missionary work. It is her calling and the condition of her being. That this work which lies at her doors is adequately done, we do not assert, but in such discussions as those to which we refer, this prosaic, unromantic, everyday work ought not to be ignored.

IT is a dangerous thing to interfere with the sacred right of the American citizen to control his own actions and to regulate his own conscience, but sometimes it becomes necessary to utter a protest when his actions become detrimental to the community. We suppose every man has the right, in one sense, to determine how far his own ethics shall follow religious enactments and traditions. If he chooses to amuse himself on Sunday by golf rather than to elevate himself by going to church, this may be conceded to be his own business. Of course there remains upon him the responsibility of his example and the influence he may wield in degrading the Lord's Day, but it is granted that to define this is not an easy matter. But when by means of offered payment he allures the small boy to bear his "bag of sticks" about the grounds all day, and so keeps him from Sunday school, or choir, his action becomes distinctly vicious. For future effects in that boy's life, he cannot entirely escape responsibility. And when, in addition, the "golfer" is a nominal Christian, perhaps a vestryman, or at least a communicant, there is an added element of viciousness, for which condemnation must be unsparring. "Whoso shall offend one of these little ones —."

ACCOUNTS which come from time to time of the lynching of Mormon preachers by alleged Christians in the Southern States, are creditable to neither the Christianity nor the civilization of those communities. Tar and feathers, the lash and the rail, are no part of the Christian armor of offence, offensive though they may be. They can hardly be considered as rightly appertaining to the propaganda of Christianity. And, an argument which, under the circumstances, may have more weight, they are absolutely ineffectual, or worse. The blood of the martyrs is the seed not only of the Church, but of every heresy in defence of which martyrdom has been endured.

The Catholicizing of Protestantism

IT appears from a little book of Prof. Harnack, recently reviewed in these columns, that the present drift of Protestant Churches is very distasteful to that leader of German Protestantism. He has in his mind the German religious bodies which are familiar to him; but the phenomena of which he complains, and against which he warns his followers, are more or less apparent in Great Britain and America. He calls the process which he observes going on at the present day, "the progressive Catholicizing of the Protestant Churches." He notices that the meaning of the word "church" has undergone a change. "The evangelical conception of a Church has almost vanished." "The ecclesiastical institution is now called the Church," and "without the slightest hesitation, all the promises of Christ are transferred to this institution or the majority of its members. We hear such expressions as "the Church speaks," "the Church demands," and the like, referring to the visible institution. Thus authority is being claimed for a body which, in Prof. Harnack's view of things, is a purely human creation, and this conception is gradually acquiring the character of a new dogma. That a tendency of this kind has been going on here also, is evident enough. Little is said nowadays about the invisible Church, the elect known only to God, but much of the Church regarded as an aggregation of evangelical denominations. The term "Churchmen" which, hardly a generation ago, was universally understood to apply to members of the Anglican Communion, is now coming to be used indiscriminately, in newspaper language at least, of people of all religious bodies. Among other symptoms of this change which Prof. Harnack enumerates, is the adoption of a "clerical uniform," and the tendency to attribute a special character to the ministry. The former is a matter of common observation, while the latter frequently crops up in controversies about Holy Orders.

ANOTHER "Catholicizing" symptom which the learned Professor deplores, is the liturgical movement. This is very marked among some of our own religious bodies. We have so lately commented upon it, that we need not particularize. But Prof. Harnack finds in this direction one of the most serious dangers to true Protestantism. We commend his remarks to those who are so eagerly advocating the use of liturgical services in their respective denominations. What he says is instructive, both for light it sheds upon his conception of true Protestantism, and also for his view of the dangers attending the use of a liturgy. Protestantism, according to this teacher, may have a creed, but it must not be authoritative, nor must it have any definite or fixed interpretation. But the tendency of a liturgy is to impress doctrinal teaching and perpetuate a particular interpretation. This is a tendency, we are told, which is "absolutely opposed to the old idea of Protestantism." Again, a liturgy brings in ideas of form and order in worship quite contrary to the Protestant principle that the Church service should be "something free, something appealing to the soul." The rules and principles found embodied in the ritual of divine service may even be utilized to combat objectionable tendencies in theology. This, of course, would be nothing but the Catholic Church over again.

WORSE than all, is the tendency of an established liturgy and ritual to give importance to matters connected with worship, such as the sacraments. Prof. Harnack will not hear of any "special and mysterious value" as attached to these observances. They are not to be distinguished from "the Word"; that is, we understand, they are object lessons, preaching by action. Such an expression as "the holy vessels" is a rude assault on true Protestantism; and the attributing of sanctity to anything connected with divine service, and "its forms and seasons," is equally reprehensible. Will the warnings of so eminent a leader of their cause be heeded by our American Protestants who are adopting the notion of a visible Church of divine authority, and seem eager, above all, to introduce into their services liturgical forms? Prof. Harnack acknowledges that the tendencies which he deprecates are "fascinating," but they constitute a temptation. He declares that this way lies "the end of Protestantism, the Gospel, the Truth." "If the development insensibly advances, and we simply capitulate to it, a second Catholicism will be formed out of the consolidation of Protestantism."

Only he does not fail to say that it will be a poorer and less intense system than the first, and that it cannot produce "saints."

WHILE we imagine the movement is destined to go on both in Germany and elsewhere, because, as we estimate it, it owes its impulse to the instinct of self-preservation, it is certainly instructive to see how it is viewed by one of the most distinguished scholars of the period. The force of his words will be somewhat blunted in their effect by the strength of the orthodox tradition which still clings about much of our American Christianity. To many of our people, the Protestantism of Harnack will still seem a thing rather to be avoided than desired, and his very criticisms may confirm them in their present course. Nevertheless, his remarks seem to contain much of truth, while his conception of Protestantism is so vague and uncertain as decidedly to lack the "fascination" of which he speaks. It is perhaps a case of Scylla and Charybdis.

"Redeeming the Time"

BY THE REV. EDWARD M. DUFF

JUST now the most important place in God's army of time-redeemers, is that which at first sight looks the least important. The grades of the social scale are the race, the State, the community, and the family. At first sight, the man who wins the name of a race reformer, or a national reformer, would seem to stand highest in the scale of time-redeemers.

But is not such an estimate superficial? At the root and basis of civilized society stands—what? The family. That race is strongest and that nation most stable, in which the family life is healthiest and purest. Under God, therefore, the father and the mother must be the most potent time-redeemers.

Here in America it requires no keenly discerning eye to see a sapping process going on in the family life through means of the divorce court. In those States where a vicious law of man has superseded the law of God's Eternal Son, granting divorces almost for the asking, a foul social cancer is gnawing at the vitals of stable civilization and weakening the integrity of that basic institution which God established before either the Church or the State—the institution of the family.

We stand sorely in need of a strict uniform divorce law as one of the redeeming forces of the time in which we live; and until such a law is enacted and enforced, we may well be called an "adulterous generation."

But another redeeming force which the time and the nation need just as sorely, is the restoration of the "family altar" in our professedly Christian households. Just here is where the divine call comes to the Christian parent to take a part in the redemption of the time—a part more important and farther reaching than the part taken by the statesman or the philanthropist of national reputation.

The Church of Christ is doomed to become a dead Church if in the households which compose it no daily sacrifice of prayer and praise arises, no sound of God's Word is heard. If the religious aspirations of the Church's households are going to be confined to an hour or so each Sunday in the house of God, if the religious instruction of the Church's children is going to be limited to the few minutes of the weekly (and often weakly) Sunday school session, we shall ere long have a lifeless, luke-warm Church filled with dead and withered branches. Then practical religion—the religion of the Nazarene—will give way to formalism and emptiness; and when this happens, there will be an abomination of desolation in this land, making it ripe for God's judgment.

If religion dies out in the family, as now so widely seems to be the case, it will be idle to talk of municipal reforms, or honest government, or the suppression of political rascality, or anti-saloon leagues, or White Cross movements.

Christian parents, upon you chiefly and supremely rests the redemption of these times. As you admit the Christ of God into your homes, as you keep the lamp of God's Spirit burning upon your household altars, you are the redeemers of your nation and your race. God looks to you, the nation looks to you, the Church looks to you, to begin now the glorious work of "redeeming the time."

"Germs of Romanism"

THE cry of "Romanism" is an old story. The clergy are tired of meeting charges of ignorant prejudice; but as they have to be met, we suggest a variation from the usual argument, which will be found very effective. It involves a small outlay for a little book; but the investment will prove a good one.

The book is the Presbyterian "Confession of Faith." With some Calvinism, which is not to the purpose, it contains some wholesome "High Church" doctrines which are to the purpose, and which, coming from such a source, cannot be objectionable to our Protestant brethren.

We quote a few passages. Only such are quoted as are necessary to set forth "dangerous doctrines." The italics and parentheses are ours:

Chapter XXV. (2.) The visible Church, which is also Catholic, &c., consists of those throughout the world that profess the true religion, together with their children; and is the Kingdom of the Lord Jesus Christ, the house and family of God, out of which there is no ordinary possibility of salvation.

(3.) Unto this Catholic, visible Church, Christ hath given the oracles of God, &c., and doth, by his own presence and Spirit, according to his promise, make them effectual thereunto.

Chapter XXVII. (1.) Sacraments are holy signs and seals of the covenant of grace.

(2.) There is in every sacrament a spiritual relation or sacramental union between the sign and the thing signified; whence it comes to pass, that the names and effects of the one are attributed to the other.

(3.) Neither doth the efficacy of a sacrament depend upon the purity or intention of him that doth administer it, but upon the work of the Spirit, and the word of institution, which contains, together with a precept authorizing it, a promise of benefit to worthy receivers.

(4.) Neither of which (the two sacraments) may be dispensed by any, but by a minister of the word, lawfully ordained.

Chapter XXVIII. (1.) Baptism is a sacrament of the New Testament, ordained by Jesus Christ, not only for the solemn admission of the party baptized into the visible Church, but also to be unto him a sign and seal of the Covenant of Grace, of his ingrafting into Christ, of regeneration, of remission of sins, &c.

(6.) The grace promised is not only offered, but really exhibited and conferred by the Holy Ghost, to such as that grace belongeth unto, according to the counsel of God's own will, in His appointed time. (That is, to "the Elect.")

Chapter XXIX. (5.) The outward elements of this sacrament (the Lord's Supper) duly set apart to the uses ordained by Christ, have such relation to Him crucified, as that truly, yet sacramentally only, they are sometimes called by the names of the things they represent; to-wit: the body and blood of Christ.

(7.) Worthy receivers, outwardly partaking of the visible elements in this Sacrament, do then also inwardly by faith, really and indeed, yet not carnally or corporally, but spiritually, receive and feed upon Christ crucified, and all benefits of his death: the body and blood of Christ being then not corporally or carnally in, with, or under the bread and wine; yet as really, but spiritually, present to the faith of believers in that ordinance, as the elements themselves are to their outward senses.

Chapter XXX. (2.) To these officers (of the Church) the keys of the Kingdom of Heaven are committed, by virtue whereof they have power respectively to retain and remit sins, to shut the Kingdom against the impenitent, &c.

The Unknown Cause of Evolution

WE are no nearer to finding the cause of evolution, says The Literary Digest, than we were before Darwin's day, and quotes Prof. H. S. Williams, Dana's successor at Yale. There is a steady progress, and species and individuals are only the places where it stops for the moment. They are but eddies in its current—eddies that attract our attention for an instant, but are really as evanescent as the rest of the stream. We can explain, or try to explain, what causes the eddies, but we can not take a single step toward accounting for the stream in which they whirl. Professor Williams continues (Science, April 26):

"Undoubtedly Darwin, writing the 'Origin of Species,' thought he had discovered, in natural selection, the chief cause of this evolution, and evolutionists have since been following his lead. But a calm review of the facts in the case must convince us that we are no nearer finding the cause of evolution than we were before Darwin. In explaining, so far as we have, the origin of species, we have been discovering the relations which natural selection, isolation, and other so-called 'factors of evolution' bear to the production of those temporary vortices in the path of evolution which we call 'individuals' and 'species.' The method of action of these 'factors' is by inducing the repetition of favorable steps of variation, swinging them back into cycles of reproduction, and thus making species where favorable conditions exist; in other words, the method is by establishing the habits or laws of heredity within organisms.

"It is the recognition of the evolution principle as fundamental that puts us on the right path of discovery. What we have to account for is not the evolution, but the haltings of evolution in the various stages of cell, individual, and species.

"Given material particles, in motion, in a resisting medium, and vortices are explainable; but no amount of change in the medium is capable of accounting for the initiation of motion in particles normally at rest."

Ten Minutes with Genesis

I AM asked to speak on the Mosaic Story of Creation. The time is too brief for that, and so I have chosen a theme which may perhaps induce you to think I am about to wander wholly away from the subject allotted me. I propose to speak to you of the progress of science in reference to the early history of our world, and to point out to you some of its marvelous agreements with what was written almost four thousand years ago.

During the last half century, scientists have been studying the effects of tidal friction; the nature of heat and light, the laws of energy, its loss as heat passes off into space, the degradation of energy when work is done, and their grand conclusion is that the universe is not eternal.

Genesis said so long ago: "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth." No contradiction here.

Science has proved that darkness preceded light. And in Genesis I find the same thing.

Modern philosophy shows that matter cannot set itself in motion, and attributes it to the great first Cause, and in that same old account, I read that it was the Spirit of God that caused the first moving.

Scientists have advanced several theories as to the nature of light, but however these may differ in other respects, they all agree that light is due to, or caused by, some form of motion, and therefore it came after motion was imparted.

In Genesis I find the same order—darkness, motion, light.

The spectroscope and its teachings are among the latest achievements of science, and one of its revelations is that light, although poor at first, became good light before the earth had ceased being self-luminous, and therefore before its dark body made a division, or separation—the only one conceivable—between light and darkness, and thus caused the first day and night on the earth.

Look at Genesis. It declares that the light was good before that division and before the first day and night.

Did scientists dream of that, fifty years ago?

Genesis gives all these facts, and in just the same order. Darkness, motion, light; light good, a division between light and darkness, and then for the first, light could be called day, and darkness, night, and then a first day with an evening and a morning.

Geologists say that in the period directly after that beginning of days, the atmosphere which filled the expanse was loaded with carbonic acid and other poisonous gases, rendering it unfit for living creatures, not good in any sense.

When I turn to Genesis, I find that its author thought as poorly of the expanse as the geologists, for he, too, does not call it good.

After this, I read that the waters were drawn off, and the dry land appeared. It is not much more than fifty years ago that geologists announced the same thing, and now they coolly appropriate the glory of the discovery.

The process of completing the land and sea, and giving them their present boundaries and life-sustaining powers, was very long, reaching from the Azic to the Pliocene, many millions of years. Genesis passes over all that time with out notice, as the eye passes over the space between us and the stars. It merely says that they, the land and waters, when God had approved them, were pronounced good.

The important fact in this connection is the author's placing modern vegetation, characterized by grass, herbs, and fruit trees, after the land and sea had been pronounced good, i. e., completed for their intended use. For good can by no possibility have reference anywhere in this story to moral character, any more than when I say a good knife, a good watch, and the like.

Geologists count it a discovery of their own that the vegetable kingdom culminated in modern species, after the completion of land and sea, and before that of the animal kingdom. Genesis said the same thing four thousand years ago.

They tell us, too, that in a subsequent period the birds and water creatures now extant made their first appearance, not in two successive epochs, but side by side.

They might have given Genesis credit for that, for it says the same thing.

They say, too, that in a yet later period the present land mammals made their appearance, especially characterized by cattle.

But though they may, if they will, read the same thing in Genesis, they give it no credit.

That the Bible speaks only of the plants and animals contemporaneous with man, is evident from the slight consideration of the facts, for, first, the terms used apply perfectly to present species; grass, herbs, and fruit trees have nothing to do with the plants of the Paleozoic; or "great whales and fowl" with the invertebrates of the Silurian; or cattle with the early land animals; and, secondly, everything else in the story refers to what the Hebrews had seen. It was the story of the creation of the world with which they were acquainted.

Go through the series. The heavens and earth, darkness, motion, light, day, and night, the firmament, land and sea, sun, moon, and stars, were as familiar to them as to us. It is incredible that here the writer abruptly changed his course and in reference to plants and animals passed back of those so well known, and began to speak of others of which neither he nor any one else knew anything, or had thought of in his wildest dreams. True, God, had He wished, might have revealed the wonders of paleontology, but He was too wise to make any mistake, and too truthful to teach error. He knew perfectly well that one who accepted the Mosaic plants and animals as the first on the earth, would be some day woefully undeceived. Why not take the easiest and most natural explanation, and admit that it was present forms of which Moses spoke? It is in perfect harmony with the truth. Why force words out of their legitimate meaning, and thus make the story tell what is not true?

Only a physicist can realize the tremendous importance of these statements and their order. If Genesis is wrong, science also is wrong, for it would be absurd to say that, for example, the order—darkness, motion, light, light perfected, the division between it and darkness, and then first day—is false in Genesis but true in science; and that the dry land coming up from beneath waters is an error here, but an important truth in geology.

I have now pointed out some thirteen or fourteen important truths, explicitly stated or logically implied in Genesis, of what modern science has but very lately learned. Back of fifty years, they were unknown.

I am far from exhausting the subject. But the little I have said will, I hope, induce you to study this story, not in commentaries, nor in the hosts of books which profess to reconcile Genesis with science, but always at the expense of one or the other, nor in the anti-reconcilers who, following in the wake of Huxley, would reduce this story to a myth borrowed, with some improvements, from the Chaldeans, and, holding what Milton wrote to be the true sense of the account, would substitute it for that old chapter itself. The only place where the Genesis story can be fairly studied is in the first page of the Bible.

I beg you to be most thorough, skip nothing, keep close to the words. In case of doubt as to the meaning of some word, consult your lexicons, not slavishly, but as freemen in the republic of letters; compare text with text. A good Hebrew concordance is indispensable. Thus studied, and the results held in the strongest light of science, there will open before you a wealth of meaning, vistas of knowledge of which you have never dared to dream.—C. B. WARRING, PH.D., in The Evangelist.

The Liturgy

THE Episcopal liturgy is not a manufacture.

It is not the product of a single mind, a single soul, or a single epoch. It does not embody the fashion of the hour. It is the expression of the devotional life of centuries; it speaks the experience not of Episcopalians, nor of Americans, nor of the nineteenth century, but of humanity. Doubtless, it is in some details archaic, not only in form of expression, but in experiences expressed. To those accustomed to the freer expression of the non-liturgical Churches, its omission of all extempore prayer will inevitably seem a capital defect. If the Episcopalian, wonted to it, may well hesitate to make any attempt to modify by modernizing it, the non-Episcopalian may well hesitate to accept it without modification. But he may at least profitably accept it as a model in forming a liturgy or semi-liturgy for his own use.

For its order is the natural order of spiritual development in an hour of public worship, in which the worshiper seeks to pass by successive steps from the secular to the spiritual mood. He begins with confession of unworthiness and prayer for forgiveness; it is assured him by the minister speaking with authority; he joins with his companions in the expression of those universal wants of humanity which the Master has summarized for us all in the prayer He gave to His disciples; and in a responsive reading from the Psalter in which all can join who know how to read. He is now prepared, by that sympathetic fellowship in worship which is more eloquent than any eloquence, to listen to instruction; and the Scripture lessons are read, intermingled with psalms of praise. He came to church, perhaps, with little faith; but if he has really and heartily joined in the outward expressions of the service thus far, he is ready, if he ever will be, to reaffirm that faith, not in philosophical definitions of doctrine, but in the great facts of historic and spiritual Christianity—the life and death of Christ, the presence of the Spirit of God in the world, the forgiveness of sins, the fellowship of Christ's followers, and personal immortality; and to follow it with more specific and fuller expression of his wants to God in prayer than has been expressed by either the General Confession or the Lord's Prayer.—The Outlook.

WHAT proof of the existence and of the laws of that unseen and unseeable world is there, or can there be, unless it is furnished to men by inspiration from God? Obviously God alone can tell of it, for he alone knows of it. When, then, priests of religion and teachers and expounders of theology themselves deny practically any heavenly inspiration, and insist that what assumes to be such is nothing more than a fabrication of human authorship—incredible often, imaginary, contradictory, childish in the palpability of its errors—what are men who are not professional theologians going to do? What else remains for them except to express dissent or to say with the agnostic, "I do not know, and as it is impossible for me to know or anybody to tell me, I dismiss the whole problem as insoluble, and all consideration of it, therefore, as hopeless waste of thought?"—New York Sun.

SOULS are won by moral compulsion, not by physical. "I cannot be in his society one hour without feeling that I am a lost man, without longing for a better life," said one of a friend eminent for his saintliness. Such is the power of holy personality. The touch of Shaftesbury saved a discharged convict. "What did he say to you?" was asked. "It was not so much what he said, but he put his arm around me, and said, 'Jack, we'll make a man of you yet.' That personal touch, that tender love, compelled the convict to come in."

Letters to the Editor

AN EXPLANATION

To the Editor of The Living Church:

In your issue of July 22nd appeared a letter over my signature, written months ago, and which I thought had long ago been consigned to the waste basket.

In the issue of Aug. 5th, I see a letter from the Rev. Dr. Duncan, of St. James' church, Alexandria, La., in which he thinks I meant to make charges against him, our revered Bishop, and our Sunday school teachers. Nothing was further from my thought; and, it seems to me, that any impartial person, on carefully reading my letter, will admit that it was written in a Christian spirit, and with the sole aim of doing good in a general way.

I did not say where these instances occurred

—whether in this State, or in some other State—for I have not always lived in St. James' parish, and no one has a right to assume that I meant more than I said. Nevertheless, they did occur, and I witnessed them.

Since the publication of my letter, I have received no less than three letters of commendation and praise—two of them from clergymen of the Church in distant States, and one from a Churchwoman in Delaware. ADA G. CHENEY.

Alexandria, La.

AID FOR PUERTO RICO

The terrible calamity which has befallen the Island of Puerto Rico appeals with emphasis to the Christian charity of our people. The destitution is beyond imagination great, and the need of prompt action is apparent, as every reader of our daily papers knows.

The Rev. George B. Pratt represents our Church at San Juan, and the Rev. Frederic Caunt is rector of the Anglican church of the Holy Trinity at Ponce. I have reason to believe that the most expeditious way of reaching the needy will be to send money by draft or money-order to De Ford & Co., Boston, Mass., who have kindly offered to transmit funds, without expense, to their houses in San Juan and Ponce, holding said funds subject to Mr. Pratt's or Mr. Caunt's order. De Ford & Co. are the fiscal agents of the United States government for Puerto Rico. Their Mr. Francis Dumaresq is officially connected with our mission in San Juan.

I plead for an immediate and generous response to this appeal. Thousands of dollars could be expended to the greatest advantage by the earnest and devoted clergymen who have been mentioned.

W. E. McLAREN,

Bishop of Chicago (in charge of Puerto Rico).

August 18, 1899.

P. S. Since the above appeal was mailed, I have received a letter from the Rev. Mr. Caunt, giving some heart-rending details of the condition at Ponce. Towns are ruined, business is suspended, and there are thousands of homeless and helpless ones. The church which he would gladly have given up to the poor creatures is too unsafe to be used. It will have to be rebuilt. I do wish that the reverend clergy, generally, would at once ask for special offerings, to be sent as above stated, to DE FORD & CO., Boston, Mass.

The third annual Retreat for priests and seminarians will be held in St. Peter's church, Westchester, New York city, beginning Monday evening, Sept. 18, 1899, with Evensong at 7:30, and concluding with celebration of the Holy Eucharist at 7 A. M., Friday, Sept. 22d. The expense for board and lodging for the period of the Retreat will be $5. The conductor will be the Rev. J. O. S. Huntington, Superior O. H. C. The reverend clergy who expect to attend, will kindly send their names to the REV. R. R. UPJOHN, committee, 296 Clinton st., Brooklyn, N. Y. City.

Church and Parish

PEOPLES' WAFERS, 25 cents per hundred; priests' wafers, one cent each. The Sisters of All Saints, 801 N. Eutaw street, Baltimore, Md., also invite orders for ecclesiastical embroidery.

WANTED.—Consecrated men and women for rescue work in the Church Army. Training of six months free. Commission, with a living assured to those satisfactorily completing the course. Fall term begins Sept. 13th. For further particulars, address MAJOR M. H. WURTS, Supt Training Home, 33-37 Gregson st., New Haven, Ct.

Life and Death

BY ELLEN MURRAY

A wild, wide sea, far reaching, terrible,
Rising in great, gray hills to front the cloud,
With strange and sullen thunders answering back
The rolling thunders of the livid shroud

Of death and horror. There was nothing more
But mingling blacknesses of storm and sea,
And by those great waves tossed, flung here and there
A reed, a straw, my small boat, helplessly

Rose to each giddy crest, then staggered down,
With sickening whirl, into the valley dread,
With parting planks astrain—no help, no light,
A wilder roar—the last, faint hope has fled.

The howling of the surf! A jagged line
Of sharper blackness meets the lightning's flash;
There lies the land, rocks piled up mountainwise,
Against whose iron sides seas whitely clash.

No help, no hope! My boat goes sweeping up
The smooth, dark, giddy billow as it lifts:
Hangs on the awful crest, then plunging down,
Melts from beneath me in the roaring drifts.

Whelmed, sinking, choked, a mote in the fierce play
Of racing whirlpools, my wild hands outflung
Were caught by a firm grasp, warm, tender, strong:
Lifted to light, I drew breath, gasped and clung

To the strong hands that held me. Was it true?
In shallow, rippling, dancing foam we stood,
While opal skies, glinting in sunny sheen,
Over the wide, fair, golden beaches brood.

And then the hills rose smooth, with winding paths,
The great palms drooped their leaves across the shine,

And tenderly and steadfastly He led
My footsteps onward from the waves' last line.

I did not lift my eyes, it needed not;
I kissed the scar upon the holding Hand
Which led me on. I sobbed in ecstasy,
"My Lord! and have I reached Thy Holy Land?"

THE late Archbishop of Canterbury had many good stories to tell. One concerned Archbishop Tait's coachman, who was a very original character. One day a clergyman who called at the palace asked him whether he had still as much to do as ever. The answer was sublime: "There's always a goodish bit doing, sir, but it's been a trifle easier since we took young Mr. Parry into the business!" The Rt. Rev. Edward Parry had recently been appointed Bishop Suffragan of Dover. Another of the Archbishop's stories, also of a coachman, will be new to many: A gentleman living in the neighborhood of Addington, finding that the stablemen were not in the habit of attending church, spoke to his coachman about it. "They ought to go," he said. "That's just what I say myself," was the rejoinder. "I says to them—look at me, I go, and what harm does it do me?"

IN an address to workingmen at the last English Church Congress, the Archbishop of Canterbury said:

My father, who was a workingman—he was a soldier—served his country in various parts, and died a governor of one of Her Majesty's colonies. The result of his death was that from the age of seventeen I have made my own living. Though I had had an excellent education, and though I put my brains to the utmost stretch of their power to do what was before me in life, I had experience, nevertheless, of a great deal of privation in the course of that time. I knew what it was, for instance, to be unable to afford a fire, and consequently to be very cold days and nights. I knew what it was every now and then to live upon rather poor fare. I knew what it was—and I think that was the thing that pinched me most—to wear patched clothes and patched shoes. When I mention these things I do so simply in order to make you understand how heartily my sympathies go along with workingmen. I believe that at this moment there is probably not another man in England who would thresh better than I could. Threshing has gone out of fashion. It is all done by machinery now, and there are very few people who learn to thresh. I learned to plow, and I could plow as straight a furrow as any man in the parish.

Pen-and-Ink-lings

PETER LOMBARD, in The Church Times, says he has it on good authority that the highest note ever known to be sung by the human voice was that sung by Miss Ellen Beach Yaw, being exactly the same as the top note on the first string of the violin, E, two octaves above the E in the top space in the clef. Lucrezia Augari, at Parma in 1770, sang for Mozart several passages of exceedingly high pitch, one of which included C6, 2,048 vibrations per second. She trilled in D5, 1,152 vibrations, and was able to sing as low as G2, 192 vibrations, having thus a range of nearly four octaves and a half. The lowest note was that sung by a basso, Fischer, F, two octaves below the F in the bottom space in the clef. The difference in the range between these two notes—the highest and lowest ever sung by human voices—was five octaves, all but one note.

AS a well-known London clergyman was recently ascending the steps to his church, an old lady requested his help. With his usual courtly grace, he gave the old woman his arm. On reaching the top step she halted, breathlessly, and asked him who was to preach. "The Rev. Mr. —," he replied, giving his own name. "Oh, dear," exclaimed the lady, "help me down again! I'd rather listen to the endless grinding of a windmill. Help me down again, I'll not go in." The minister smiled, and gently assisted her down, remarking as he parted with her, "I wouldn't go in either if I weren't the preacher."

AT an examination of the College of Surgeons, says a volume of so-called "Literary Gems," a candidate was asked by Abernethy what he would do if a man were blown up by gunpowder. "Why," coolly answered the tyro, "wait till he came down again." "True," said Abernethy, "and suppose I kicked you for such an impertinent reply, what muscles should I put in motion?" "Why," said the young man, "the flexors and extensors of my right arm, for I should floor you directly."

A PROPOS of the intolerable slowness of the cabs in Berlin, it is related that, a child having been run over by one of them and killed, Mark Twain who was living in Berlin at the time, exclaimed on hearing of the accident: "What a lingering death!"

THE opening of the new building of the Charitable Eye and Ear Infirmary of Boston recalled to the Herald, of that city, Mrs. Julia Ward-Howe's mot on the institution: "Charitable Eye and Ear! I didn't know Boston had either."

OLD Cardinal Mertel, who has just passed to the majority at the age of ninety-six, was the only member of the Sacred College who wore whiskers, and as these almost to the very last retained their red color, he presented a rather odd appearance in all the great ecclesiastical ceremonies in which the cardinals were called upon to play a role. He is the last of those lay cardinals, of whom the most famous in modern times was the late Cardinal Antonelli, Secretary of State to Pius IX. Cardinal Mertel was a lawyer by profession, and the rank of cardinal was conferred upon him partly as a reward for his services as chief law officer of the Papacy, and likewise as Minister of the Interior of the Holy See, in the days prior to 1870, when the Pope still enjoyed temporal sovereignty. Leo XIII has appointed only one layman as cardinal; namely, the late Cardinal Cristoforo, who was Regent of the Apostolic Penitentiary, and renowned for his genius as an administrator.

A writer in Collier's Weekly says that for the future, the automobile holds out the promise of a city practically free from the maddening street noises that make modern urban existence more or less a torture. Cobble pavements are laid to resist metal tires and the pounding of steel-shod horses. With every vehicle motor-driven, and every wheel pneumatic tired, all pavements can be of asphalt. Not only will the rumbling of heavy trucks and the clatter of hoof beats disappear, but there will be no more tracks to cut up the streets, since electric omnibuses, carrying as many people and moving as swiftly as the electric cars of to-day, will take the place of street railways. Rapid transit for long distances being supplied by electric trains in clean, cool, brilliantly-lighted subways, the elevated roads will be no more. The removal of the horse from the streets will not only make them noiseless, but will practically solve the problem of street cleaning, and greatly improve the sanitary conditions of urban life, reducing the amount of street refuse to a minimum. With clean, smooth thoroughfares, through which swift, air-shod, easy-riding vehicles dart noiselessly, it will no longer be necessary to seek the country for rest and quiet.

THE church of St. Martin-in-the-Fields, Charing Cross, says The Sketch, has lately been adorned by a fine stained-glass window representing its patron saint, St. Martin of Tours, in the act of cutting his cloak in two with his sword, in order to cover a poor beggar (really our Lord), as is told in a legend relating to the early life of the saint. The window has been finely executed, with admirable qualities of coloring, from the designs of Anthony J. Westlake, an artist who has done much work in America.

IN the Gallican Church there are two St. Martin's, viz: Nov. 11, St. Martin, bishop; Nov. 12, St. Martin, presbyter. Our Indian Summer is termed L'ete de St. Martin, the summer of St. Martin.

Notes from "Eaglesnest"

IX.

I WAS writing about rainbows a few days ago, and this morning a bright one came up out of the west, as much as to say, "You shall be rewarded for being out with the early bird!"

It is not often that one sees a rainbow at sunrise. Neither rainbows nor their admirers are given to early rising. But I saw one from the crater of Vesuvius at sunrise, many years ago, and it was a sight never to be forgotten. It spanned the Bay of Naples with a glow of color that was enchanting, and it was more than a half-circle in its sweep. It was like an Oriental dome outlined with prismatic fire; shaped like a horse shoe, if one may borrow from earth so small a thing to illustrate the form of a celestial splendor so large. This wonderful effect was due to the great elevation of my point of view, overlooking the sea, far above the horizon over which the sun was rising. From a balloon several miles above the earth, one might see the whole circle of the sun's masterpiece, provided he were not above the clouds. What should we call it then? Would it be a "bow"?

The expanded arch which I saw from Vesuvius was all the more beautiful and impressive from contrast with the desolation and dreadfulness of the scene around me. It was as if one were gazing from the brink of the Inferno through a rift of sulphurous smoke, at the light and love and joy of heaven. There was no fire visible in the crater; it was a vast valley filled with writhing gloom, wherein were slumbering thunders and chained lightnings, the groanings and flashings of which we had heard and seen during the night as we toiled up the slopes amid titanic masses of solidified lava. The rain hissed as it fell upon the rocks; in the clefts on either side was the angry glow of fire that is never quenched. Choking vapors from the bottomless pit waved their deadly wings around us, and motioned us to move on, while spectres gigantic seemed to beckon to us from the valley of death below. Our feet were scorched, our faces were fanned by the breath of fiery dragons, our eyes were smarting in the smoke, our climbing sticks, which had been thrust into the hot scorice, were on fire. Then the sun came forth as a giant, dispelling the gloom above, and driving the night dragons of the crater deeper into the volcanic gloom below; and the rain-drops rejoiced that on their way to refresh the earth they might delight the eyes of men by flinging a seven-hued halo of glory above the blue Bay of Naples. So out of the beams of light they made a rainbow for me such as man has seldom seen. I was alone upon the mount, save for the presence of the good-natured guides who were thinking only of the francs they should receive, and the macaroni they should eat,—alone while the Lord passed by, with such revelations of majesty and glory as no pen can describe. The night of toil and tempest was over, the perils of the way were past, the goal was reached, and the terrors and dangers by which it was surrounded had faded before the rising sun. There was the scene of grandeur for which I had toiled all the night, and there was much more. The symbol of God's unchangeable love glorified it all, and gave it meaning, and made it a revelation to me.

Even so when life's toilsome night is ended, and we have come, through the peril and pain of our earthly pilgrimage, to the lifting of the veil, may we know the meaning of life's mystery, and have the vision of the glory which "eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, nor hath it entered into the heart of man to conceive." And in that vision there shall be a Rainbow, full-orbed, and completely encircling the Throne of God.

The Need of Play

AN article in Popular Science, on Muscular Exercise, by L. Gulick, M.D., gives as a part of his discussion the author's observations of the play-instinct in children. He divides the life of youth into five periods—not with exact limitations, but in an indefinite way, for convenience. These are babyhood to the age of three years; early childhood, three to seven; childhood, seven to twelve; early adolescence, twelve to seventeen; later adolescence, seventeen to twenty-three. The baby loves to grasp things, rattle paper, splash water, play in sand and dirt, and, in the way of business, we may add, inquire of everything it can handle whether it be good to eat. In early childhood the instinct of construction begins to appear—building blocks, cutting things if it can get hold of scissors or knife; climbing, swinging, etc. The play is individualistic, not co-operative. The child has no idea of the infliction of pain—will torture its kitten or a fly. From seven to twelve, girls take to dolls, but drop them at that age and take to live babies, if they can get them to play with. The boys show higher constructive ideas, build dams, make paddle wheels, and do even more complex constructive work. Their plays are competitive. They have a passion for bonfires, and for strange pets—coons, squirrels, turtles, and are devoted to their dogs. From twelve to seventeen the boy is in for a display of his muscle, all kinds of tournaments, fighting, and the predatory instinct—stealing apples and melons, not because he wants them. From seventeen to twenty-three the play is such as will call out the utmost muscular force and agility. The author does not particularize the whole line—but the reader will readily place house-keeping where it belongs in the play of the girls, and horsemanship where it belongs in the play of the boys. His conclusion is that play is essential to the development of the mind as well as of the body—especially of the mind; and that children who are deprived of it remain through life examples of arrested or imperfect development. We suppose that periods of play in adult life could also be defined in a general way, though with less certainty. We would say that the horse period sets in at twenty-three and lasts till thirty-five. After that come the fads. These are not continuous, but recurrent, changeable, and various. One man we know has a strange fancy for duck-farming; squanders thousands of dollars on his ducks. Another takes to chickens; another to fancy breeds of cattle or other live stock; another to fruit culture; another to floriculture; many to hunting, more to fishing, some to art—and so on. All this is play. What is play? Possibly a definition of labor would be, any activity in which the will is compelled, and of play, any activity in which the will is free. Thus play passes readily over into labor, and labor into play. The essence of play, then, is freedom. This being true, the refreshment given by play comes of the retirement of the tired faculties to rest, and the concentration of the vital energies upon faculties which are longing for exercise. These suppressed tendencies are mostly survivals of primitive life. What we call "sport" is modified savagery—hunting, fishing, athletics, boxing, wrestling, etc. The popularity of football is because it comes the nearest to the primitive sport of warfare. The desire for play is therefore life-long—or so long as there is any surplus of physical energy left over after the supply of our natural wants.

Aging people who are released from regular toil are liable to overestimate the unused energy which they feel in their muscles—and their physicians continually warn them that they can not do safely what they could do with impunity and with pleasure when younger. And yet the immediate cause of the death of most old people comes of disregard of such warning. Their play should be moderate. We recall a fine old lady, past eighty, whom we saw a few weeks ago, happy as a girl, among her chickens. She may be seen in hatching time with her apron full of the little fluffs. She prepares their food, is strict in her orders about the care of their coops and quarters. This outdoor life keeps her cheery and well. She is not aware, however, that her daughter is watching and caring for her with more assiduity than she is giving to her poultry. A number of old men whom we know are deeply interested in their flowers. But old children, like young ones, should have change and variety. Hockey, tiddler-winks, or shinney would soon become labor to the boy, if he had no other game.

As play is necessary to the development of the child in mind and body, so is it necessary to the preservation of those who are on the decline of life. It is frequently said in an admiring way, of old people that they do not grow old—retain freshness and attractiveness of spirit and of disposition. By that it is meant that they are full of the play-instinct—that it has not been atrophied by greed, nor by indolence, which would be their own fault; or that they have not been broken in spirit by bereavement and sorrow and care; and that they have not been exhausted by unavoidable toil, nor by disease and physical suffering, none of which are by any shortcoming of their own.

Play was frowned upon by the Puritans as inappropriate to the "solemn realities" of human life—and they berated each other and themselves for the "sin of levity." But the self-preservative instinct was too strong for the doctrine, and when the Puritan broke loose, as he often did, he was a boisterous sportsman. He unconsciously raised the question of the proper limitations of play. But play is as necessary to human progress and welfare as work is. Where, then, shall we draw the line? We would say, in a broad way, that play is entitled to all the energy which is left over from self-supporting work, and that it should be limited strictly to the use of that energy—should stop short of exhausting it—whether in physical or intellectual amusement.

Play cannot be enjoyed, even by children, if it do not come in a release from labor. There is no life so dismal as one which is given over to play, except one, that which is given over to unrelieved labor. The child, in the absence of required labor, makes it for himself. He digs and builds and carries with all his little strength. We should probably make another exception—and say that the most miserable of all lives is that of indolence—a dull and stupid monotony, unrelieved either by the incentives and rewards of toil, or by the exhilaration and inspiration of play.—The Interior.

Book Reviews and Notices

Through Nature to God. By John Fiske. Boston and New York: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. Price, $1.

This exceedingly interesting book consists of three parts, entitled respectively, "The Mystery of Evil," "The Cosmic Roots of Love and Self Sacrifice," and "The Everlasting Reality of Religion." The first of these appeared as an article in the Atlantic Monthly, and was commented upon at some length in the columns of this paper. As a contribution to the vindication of religion on natural grounds, along the lines of the evolution philosophy, the volume, small as it is, appears to be very important. While the hypothesis allows no place for revealed or supernatural religion, some of the author's conclusions raise the question whether the view of things which he presents can be complete without some positive manifestation from that unseen world, the existence of which he admits as a postulate. The author regards "the detection of the part played by the lengthening of infancy in the Genesis of the human race" as his own "especial contribution to the doctrine of evolution." This is treated in the second part, pp. 86-101. One of the most striking passages in the book is that in which Mr. Fiske vindicates the reality of the "world invisible and immaterial," on the principles of evolution. Evolution through countless ages proceeded by way of adjustments to external realities; but the highest products of this progress have been the fruit of a long process of adjustments to the demands of religion. If, then, religion is based upon non-realities, we have the strange result that at some point in time the method was changed: "Nature, after having throughout the whole round of her inferior products achieved results through the accumulation of all true steps, and pitiless rejection of all false steps, suddenly changed her method, and in the case of her highest product, began achieving results through the accumulation of false steps." Such a suggestion, Mr. Fiske declares to be an "insult to our understandings." He considers that his argument here, which we regret that we cannot quote in full, "puts the scientific presumption entirely and decisively on the side of religion and against all atheistic and materialistic explanations of the universe." Mr. Fiske is a learned man, and a man of wide reading, but it is no disparagement of him to say that his knowledge of the great theological writers of the Catholic Church is not profound. He repeats the antithesis to which currency was given in a notable book published some years back, between the Greek idea of God and the Latin idea of God. The latter is defined as "the idea of a power outside of the course of nature, and occasionally interfering with it," or, again, "A God remote from the world." On the other hand, the "Greek idea" recognizes God as immanent in the world, and manifested every moment through the orderly sequence of its phenomena." Mr. Fiske has necessarily taken this at second hand. Greek Christianity never doubted the miracles of Scripture or of the Church. Its early hagiology was full of marvels. The Latins never doubted the omnipresence of God. The simple fact is, that the theology of the Church recognized the paradox wherein God is acknowledged as both immanent and transcendent—both in nature, and above, or superior to, nature. One or the other might be emphasized of particular writers, or in different passages of the same writer, according to his purpose. It may be that in the West the thought of God as a Person, or "quasi-human," as our author terms it was more in evidence, because of its evident relation to ethics. Perhaps this may have something to do with the higher stages of civilization generally admitted to have been attained in the Western world. At any rate, the author himself admits that what he calls a quasi-human God is essential to the notion of God: "Take away," he says, "from our symbolic conception of God, the human element, and that aspect of theism which has from the outset chiefly interested mankind, is gone." Here, we may add, we have the entering wedge of Revealed Religion.

Puerto Rico. Its Conditions and Possibilities. By William Dinwiddie. With Illustrations from Photographs by the Author. New York: Harper & Brothers. 1899. Price, $2.50

The opening chapter, describing the evacuation of Puerto Rico, reads like a tale of romance. It was certainly an eventful moment when at noon on Oct. 18th, 1898, Spanish rule ceased on the Island of Puerto Rico, and the stars and stripes floated out over this veritable paradise. All this is admirably told by our author.

But the book has an intensely practical side. In it one can find a comprehensive presentation of the industrial, commercial, political, and social conditions existing in Puerto Rico to day, with a mass of facts, figures, and comparisons of past institutions with the present.

One can see from all that is thus so well presented, that while the island affords splendid opportunities for the man of money, at present, at least, it is no place for the man of small means. The pictures which our author gives of the peon class, living half-clad in their palm-thatched cottages, represent them as happy and contented enough, and possibly many a squatter in Kansas, or the farther West, would, after all, gladly exchange their present surroundings for the insouciance of primitive life on the fertile hillsides of Puerto Rico. The land being held by "land kings," prevents effectually any inroad of such a class as this, and the Peons will continue to flourish until they learn discontent and industry, with the appreciation of its proper rewards. One can easily see that in coming years Puerto Rico will become a veritable winter paradise for the United States. The admirable illustrations in the volume show picturesque and romantic scenery, and in comprehensive detail our author gives most useful information on all manner of subjects connected with the island. The book might be used as a guide by those contemplating a visit to this our new possession, whether for pleasure or for profit.

Spiritual Instructions. The Religious Life. By the Rev. T. T. Carter, Canon of Christ Church, Oxford, and Warden of Cleaver. New York: Longmans, Green & Co. Pp. 167. Price, $1.25.

This is a new edition, with a new preface, of what has become a standard work. It is not a scientific treatise upon the religious life as such, but a devotional book for those who are attempting to live that life. After a general statement of the great principles which are to be embodied in that manner of life, it goes on to deal in the most helpful way with various aspects and difficulties of it. As a devotional writer, Canon Carter has never been surpassed in any age of the Church. His books are full of a sweet reasonableness, and exemplify the finest and highest type of devotion. While perfectly healthy and never overstrained, they reach the highest levels of spirituality. Each of them is a devotional classic.

TOADYISM SHOWN IN CHURCH.—President McKinley was twenty minutes late in attending church last Sunday. His tardiness was occasioned by the ignorance of his coachman, who did not know the way to the church. The entire congregation arose when the president entered the church and remained standing until he reached his seat, repeating the formality when he departed. This, of course, interrupted the order of worship; in short, the service had to wait while the President was served. Now arises the question: Who will be held responsible for that interrupted service—President McKinley who was twenty minutes late; his ignorant coachman who made him late, or the congregation which for the moment preferred to concern itself with things temporal rather than spiritual?

ENCOURAGEMENT TO MOB LAW.—Judge Candler, of Georgia, is quite right in notifying critics in the Northern States, that they will do well to look at the lawlessness nearer home. In the South, as Judge Candler points out substantially, mobs assemble to punish crimes which stir the blood to the point of insanity, while in the North they are provoked by controversies about the management of property, the rate of wages, and the like. But, after all, it is not mainly a question between North and South. The lawlessness exists in both sections, and that in the South is not entirely confined to cases where there are outrages upon women. Apart from these special cases, the complaint that courts, juries, and lawyers in both sections are largely to blame for mob violence is not to be so easily disposed of as Judge Candler appears to imagine. So many men escape the ordinary processes of the courts and continue careers of crime, that mob law is constantly pointing to a failure of the courts as the excuse for its existence.

PET FOLLY OF TRUST PROMOTERS.—A published statement, made by one of the promoters of the trust which is being formed by the glove manufacturers of the United States, contains a striking illustration of the fatuous notion upon which the men who create such big combinations base their hopes of great profits. It is another avowal of the purpose of trusts to get along with one traveling salesman when fifty were used under the old conditions. Imagine one salesman representing a complete monopoly visiting a town to sell gloves, where ten or twenty salesmen go with the same line of merchandise now. He would never be able to escape the deadening effect of the consciousness that he had no competition. So the easy-going dealers who sold gloves at retail would let their stocks run low because they would be under no pressure to increase them. They would not carry stock enough to make them care about reducing it. "All special efforts to stimulate business would be made in lines showing more life and presenting more novelties. The natural result, of course, would be to lessen the number of gloves worn in any community in a given length of time. All along, from the manufacturer to the consumer, there would be lethargy in the glove business. Then it would be learned anew how much truth there is in the old saying that competition is the life of trade."

LITURGICAL TENDENCIES.—The tendency in Presbyterian Churches towards the use of some sort of a liturgy deserves careful attention. If it implies a desire for a mere outward and æsthetic adornment of the services, then it is a tendency to formalism. If it springs out of a decline in the distinctively spiritual element in the worship of the sanctuary, then it is something to be avoided, and remedied as soon as possible. If it arises from a genuine desire to enrich our somewhat plain form of worship, and to make it more effective, we are inclined to think that this desire is mistaken, and will doom those who cherish it to serious disappointment. What is most to be desired is emphasis on the spirit rather than on the forms in the worship of God in the services of the sanctuary. To avoid the force of the demand for a liturgy, our ministers should give most careful attention to all the liturgical parts of the services of God's house. The hymns and the Scriptures should be read with great care. This can be done only by constant attention and practice. Then the prayers, both in their form and matter, should be carefully studied. Vain repetitions, confused petitions, and slovenly expressions must be avoided. This needs reflection and careful consideration beforehand. If this be done, then free prayer will be found far the best. It will preserve the spiritual factor, give scope and flexibility, and render all liturgies and reading of prayers quite unnecessary. This is equally true of marriage, baptismal, Communion and funeral services, as of the public worship of the Lord's house.

The Household

Recreation in Figures

IF it be true that figures won't lie, that they won't even equivocate, that two and two exhibit an unbending determination to make four and nothing but four, at least figures do often play strange pranks. They abound in paradoxes, and though a paradox is rightly defined as a truth that only appears to be a lie, yet the stern moralist who hates even the appearance of evil, looks with scant favor upon a paradox. We don't have far to look.

There is the number nine. It is a most romantic number, and a most persistent, self-willed, and obstinate one. You cannot multiply it away or get rid of it anyhow. Whatever you do, it is sure to turn up again as did the body of Eugene Aram's victim. Mr. W. Green who died in 1794, is said to have first called attention to the fact that all through the multiplication table the product of nine comes to nine. Multiply by any figure you like, and the sum of the resultant digits will invariably add up to nine. Thus, twice 9 is 18; add the digits together, and 1 and 8 make 9. Three times 9 is 27; and 2 and 7 is 9. So it goes on up to 11 times 9, which gives 99. Very good. Add the digits together, 9 and 9 is 18, and 8 and 1 is 9. Go on to any extent, and you will find it impossible to get away from the figure 9. Take an example at random. Nine times 339 is 3,051; add the digits together, and they make nine. Or again, nine times 2,127 is 19,143; add the digits together, they make 18, and 8 and 1 is 9. Or still again, 9 times 5,071 is 45,639; the sum of these digits is 27, and 2 and 7 is 9.

This seems startling enough. Yet there are other queer examples of the same form of persistence. It was M. de Maivan who discovered if you take any row of figures, and, reversing their order, make a subtraction sum of obverse and reverse, the final result of adding up the digits of the answer will always be nine. As for example:—

Now, 1 plus 4 plus 4 plus 9 equals 18; and 1 plus 8 equals 9.

The same result is obtained if you raise the numbers so changed to their squares or cubes. Start anew, for example, with 62; reversing it, you get 26. Now, 62—26 equals 36, and 3 plus 6 equals 9. The squares of 26 and 62 are, respectively, 676 and 3,844. Subtract one from the other, and you will get 3,168, equals 18, and 1 plus 8 equals 9. So with the cubes of 26 and 62, which are 17,576 and 238,328. Subtracting, the result is 220,752, equals 18, and 1 plus 8 equals 9.

Again you are confronted with the same puzzling peculiarity in another form. Write down any number, as, for example, 7,549,132; subtract therefrom the sum of its digits, and, no matter what figures you start with, the digits of the results will always come to 9.

7,549,132, sum of digits equals 31.

7,549,101, sum of digits equals 27, and 2 plus 7 equals 9.

Again, set the figure 9 down in multiplication, thus:

$$\begin{array}{r} 1 \text{ times } 9 \text{ equals } 9 \\ 2 \text{ " } 9 \text{ " } 18 \end{array}$$

$$\begin{array}{r} 3 \text{ times } 9 \text{ equals } 27 \\ 4 \text{ " } 9 \text{ " } 36 \\ 5 \text{ " } 9 \text{ " } 45 \\ 6 \text{ " } 9 \text{ " } 54 \\ 7 \text{ " } 9 \text{ " } 63 \\ 8 \text{ " } 9 \text{ " } 72 \\ 9 \text{ " } 9 \text{ " } 81 \\ 10 \text{ " } 9 \text{ " } 90 \end{array}$$

Now you will see that the tens column reads down, 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, and the units column up, 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9.

Here is a different property of the same number. If you arrange in a row the cardinal numbers from 1 to 9, with the single omission of 8, and multiply the sum so represented by any one of the figures multiplied by 9, the result will present a succession of figures identical with that which was multiplied by 9. Thus, if you wish a series of fives, you take 5 times 9 equals 45, for a multiplier, with this result:

$$\begin{array}{r} 12345679 \\ \times 45 \\ \hline 61728395 \\ 49382716 \\ \hline 55555555 \end{array}$$

A very curious number is 142,857, which, multiplied by 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, or 6, gives the same figures in the same order, beginning at a different point, but if multiplied by 7, gives all nines. Multiplied by 1 it equals 142,857; multiplied by 2, equals 285,714; multiplied by 3, equals 428,571; multiplied by 4, equals 571,428; multiplied by 5, equals 714,285; multiplied by 6, equals 857,142; multiplied by 7, equals 999,999. Multiply 142,857 by 8 and you have 1,142,856. Then add the first figure to the last, and you have 142,857, the original number, the figures exactly the same as at the start.

The number 37 has this strange peculiarity—multiplied by 3, or by any multiple of 3 up to 27, it gives three figures all alike. Thus, three times 37 will be 111. Twice three times (6 times) 37 will be 222; three times three times (9 times) 37 gives three threes; four times three times (12 times) 37, three fours; and so on.

The wonderful procreative power of figures, or rather their accumulative growth, has been exemplified in that familiar story of the farmer who, undertaking to pay his farrier one grain of wheat for the first nail, two for the second, and so on, found that he had bargained to give the farrier more wheat than was grown in all England.

Here is another example. Take the number 15, let us say. Multiply that by itself, and you get 225. Now multiply 225 by itself and so on until fifteen products have been multiplied by themselves in turn. You don't think that is a difficult problem? Well, you may be a clever mathematician, but it would take you about a quarter of a century to work out this simple little sum. The final product called for contains 38,589 figures, the first of which are 1,442. Allowing three figures to an inch, the answer would be over 1,070 feet long. To perform the operation would require about 500,000,000 figures. If they can be made at the rate of one a minute, a person working ten hours a day for three hundred days in each year, would be twenty-eight years about it. If, in multiplying, he should make a row of ciphers, as he does other figures, the number of figures would be more than 523,939,228. This would be the precise number of figures used if the product of the left hand figure in each multiplicand by each figure of the multiplier was always a single figure, but as it is most frequently, though not always, two figures, the method employed to obtain the foregoing result cannot be accurately applied. Assuming that the cipher is used on an average once in ten times, 475,000,000,000 approximates the actual number.

There is a clever Persian story about a wealthy Oriental who, dying, left seventeen camels to be divided as follows: His eldest son to have half, his second son a third, and his youngest a ninth. But how divide camels into fractions? The three sons in despair consulted Mohammed Ali. "Nothing easier," said the wise man. "I'll lend you another camel to make eighteen, and now divide them yourselves." The consequence was that each brother got from one eighth of a camel to one half more than he was entitled to, and Ali received his camel back again—the eldest brother getting nine camels, the second six, and the third two.

There are many mathematical queries afloat whose object is to puzzle the wits of the unwary listener, or to beguile him into giving an absurd reply. Some of these are very ancient. Many are excellent. Who, for example, has not at some period of his existence been asked, "If a goose weighs ten pounds and half its own weight, what is the weight of the goose?" And who has not been tempted to reply on the instant, fifteen pounds. The correct answer is, of course, twenty pounds. Indeed, it is astonishing what a very simple query will sometimes catch a wise man napping. Even the following has been known to succeed:

"How many days would it take to cut up a piece of cloth fifty yards long, one yard being cut off every day?"

Or this: "A snail climbing up a post twenty feet high ascends five feet every day, and slips down four feet every night; how long will the snail take to reach the top of the post?"

Or again: "A wise man having a window one yard high and one yard wide, and requiring more light, enlarged his window to twice its former size; yet the window was still only one yard high and one yard wide. How was this done?"

This is a catch question in geometry, as the preceding were catch questions in arithmetic—the window being diamond shaped at first, and afterwards made square. As to the former, perhaps it is scarcely necessary to say that the answer to the first is not fifty days, but forty-nine; and to the second, not twenty days, but sixteen—since the snail, who gains one foot each day for fifteen days, climbs on the sixteenth day to the top of the pole, and there remains.

Numbers have a legendary and mystic signification. It is not only the mathematician that has been fascinated by them. The poet, the philosopher, the priest, have pondered over their changeless relations to each other, have seen in mathematical truth the one thing absolutely fixed and sure, and have come to look upon numbers and their symbols as in some sort a revelation from on high, things to be dealt with reverently and awesomely. And so almost every number has been given an esoteric meaning.

The number one, as being indivisible, and as entering into all other numbers, was always a sacred number. The Egyptians made it the symbol of life, or mind, of the creative spirit.

Three, in the Pythagorean system, was the perfect number, expressive of beginning, middle, and end. From time immemorial, greater prominence has been given to it than to any other number, save perhaps seven. And as the symbol of the Trinity, its influence has waxed more potent in more recent times. It appears over and over again in the Old Testament and the New.

When the world was created we find land, water, and sky, sun, moon, and stars. Noah had three sons; Jonah was three days in the whale's belly; Christ three days in the tomb. There were three patriarchs—Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. Abraham entertained three angels. Job had three friends. Samuel was called three times. Samson deceived Delilah three times. Three times Saul essayed to kill David with a javelin. Jonathan shot three arrows on David's behalf. Daniel was thrown into a den with three lions for praying three times a day. Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego were rescued from the fiery furnace. The Commandments were delivered on the third day. St. Paul speaks of faith, hope, and charity, these three. Three wise men came to worship Christ with presents three. Christ spoke three times to Satan when tempted. He prayed three times before His betrayal. Peter denied Him three times. Christ suffered three hours' agony on the cross. The superscription was in three languages, and three men were crucified. The third day Christ rose again, and appeared three times to His disciples. And so on, and so on. It were tedious to continue the enumeration.—Southern Churchman.

Moving Millions of Gold

BIGGER heaps of gold than ever were buried by Captain Kidd or carried by rakish craft in the palmy days of the Spanish Main, are week in and week out hauled around New York city, to and from banks and steamship wharves, in a commonplace truck.

The business of moving the gold used in the settlement of commercial balances, is always active in New York, for the credits and debits between the local banks and, in a wider sense, between the United States and foreign countries, are daily shifting and must constantly be met. Of course a growing share of the exchanges between banks is made by the check system and the clearing house, so that after the associated banks, by their representatives, have met together in the morning of each business day and exchanged the checks on each other taken in the previous day's transactions, only the differences have to be paid in actual money.

Thus it happens that the actual exchange of cash is generally less than ten per cent. of the total clearings, or exchanges of checks. For example, one day recently, when the New York banks had the largest clearings ever recorded—more than $352,000,000—all that immense sum was paid and received by the use of only $15,000,000 of actual money. Ordinarily this money would have been in the form of greenbacks, but for some months bills have been very scarce, and clearing house balances have uniformly been paid in gold, as are foreign balances.

Although foreign shipments of specie are almost constant in one direction or the other, the operation is always attended by danger and expense, so exchange bankers must see a substantial profit in it before shipment. This is possible only when the exchange rates in the debtor country rise high enough to pay for insurance, commission, and interest on the gold in transit.

When the balance of trade demands actual shipments, New York bankers or foreign exchange houses call in the services of Mr. Barkley, a rotund truckman, well known to everybody in Wall street. He has a monopoly of the trucking of gold there; all the bankers know and trust him, as they did his father for more than forty years. Barkley has a slate hanging in a doorway near the Stock Exchange, and his trucks stand near by when not busy. The bankers send a clerk or messenger for Barkley when they want any carting done. The last time I passed that door, the slate said: "Call at J. P. Morgan & Co's and see Mr. King." Another day it may contain one or half a dozen orders from the big houses, and thither Barkley or one or two of his men go to do their bidding.

Gold in transit is packed into small rouleaux, wrapped carefully in little canvas bags. The small bags are encased in bigger and heavier ones. The whole thing is then put into a small keg and the interstices are filled with sawdust. This is to prevent abrasion, for gold that is much worn by rolling around loses considerably in value.

Some gold stays in its wrappings for months and years together. It may in that time have traveled a dozen or twenty times across the ocean, or it may have lain untouched in bank vault or clearing house. When moved about on the trucks, it might be supposed that a big guard of men would be necessary to watch lest some agile thief get away with one of the little kegs. But the little kegs are their own protection; the $60,000 they contain makes troublesome lifting for two men, and only a Sandow of a thief would have any chance to get away in safety.

All gold shipments of any magnitude go only by the fastest ships, which are built with special compartments for gold down on the keelson and far in the bows.

When Barkley or his European confreres bring a consignment aboard, it is carefully stored in the ship's vault and the purser takes sole charge of the keys. The first officer of the vessel sees that the vault is covered fathoms deep with the solidest kind of freight. If any robberies have occurred, they have never been recorded.—Saturday Evening Post.

Poor But Rich

ONCE in England I was driving with an old farmer, and some of the neighborhood came under criticism. Speaking of a prominent man in the village, I asked: "He is a man of means?"

"Well, sir," the farmer replied, "he ain't got much money, but he's mighty rich."

"He has a great deal of land, then?" I asked.

"No, sir, he ain't got much land, neither; but still he is mighty rich."

The old farmer, with a pleased smile, observed my puzzled look for a moment, and then explained:

"You see he ain't got much money, and he ain't got much land, but still he is rich, because he never went to bed owing a man a cent in all his life. He lives as well as he wants to live, and pays as he goes; he doesn't owe anything, and he ain't afraid of anybody; he tells every man the truth, and does his duty by himself, his family, and his neighbors; his word is as good as his bond, and every man, woman, and child in the town looks up to him and respects him. No, sir, he ain't got much land; but still he is a mighty rich man, because he's got all he wants."

I assented to the old farmer's deductions, for I thought them entirely correct. When a man has all he needs and all he wants, he is certainly rich, and when he lacks these things, he is certainly poor.—Outlook.

ST. MARY'S, KNOXVILLE, ILLINOIS

A School for Girls--A College for Young Women.

RE-OPENS WEDNESDAY, SEPT. 13.

ST. MARY'S, Knoxville, is one of the oldest institutions in the State, yet up to the times in its appointments and methods. With its superb buildings and equipment, its healthy location, its corps of experienced instructors, its more than thirty years of continuous success, it may fairly claim a place among the leading institutions for the preparatory and higher education of women. The course in music is notably advanced, being under Wm. H. Sherwood, of Chicago, Visiting Director. Daily exercise under the Sargent system of Gymnastics and in the open air has secured splendid results in physical development. Eighteen States and Territories were last year represented among its one hundred and twenty students. Address the

Children's Hour

Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations,
That is known as the Children's hour.

The Little People

A dreary place would be the earth,
Were there no little people in it;
The song of life would lose its mirth
Were there no children to begin it;
No little forms like buds to grow,
And make the admiring heart surrender;
No little heads on breast and brow
To keep the thrilling love chords tender.
The sterner soul would grow more stern,
Unfeeling nature more inhuman,
And man to stoic coldness turn,
And woman would be less than woman.
Life's song indeed would lose its charm,
Were there no babies to begin it;
A doleful place this world would be Where there no little people in it.

—John G. Whittier.

Ruth's Penny

"The briar's in bud and the sun's going down," sang Ruth Barstow, as she sat in the farmhouse doorway with her hands clasped around her knees, and her head resting against the door casing.

She was looking across the stretch of grove-dotted Minnesota table-land to the western sky, against which lay the crimson panorama of the sunset.

"M-m-m-m-m, 'And I haven't a penny,
And how shall I get me to Twickenham Town?'"

Again she sang in a meditative way.

"Why not walk, Ruth?" suggested her sister Lois, a grave, sweet-faced woman of twenty-six, who was folding a pile of freshly ironed clothes.

"But it's a ferry, Lois," put in Miriam, the youngest of the three sisters. "Ruth, you'll have to give up the trip, unless you can borrow the penny, for there's no way to earn it in this solitude," laughed the girl.

Here Kirstine, the Danish help who had been in the Barstow family when the girls' mother died, appeared at the door, saying:

"Ruth, the calves are in the garden."

"Oh, my parsley! and oh, my cress! and oh, my phlox and bouncing Bess!" exclaimed Ruth, and was off around the corner of the house in a twinkling. After an exciting chase, supplemented by such shoo-ing, and waving of a kitchen towel by Kirstine, and some intelligent heading off on the part of Shep, the discreet old farm dog, Ruth drove the frolicsome calves into the barnyard, and repaired the damage to the garden beds.

The brief twilight of a June day had begun when she reappeared, and again seated herself on the door sill, saying:

"I tell you, girls, I'm tired of being all the toy my father has, but I'm tired of being of so little use to him. Daddy needs a good, strong man, and he needs him the year around."

"Yes, Ruth, but if the crops should fail again, there would be nothing with which to pay him," said Lois.

"There will be heavy crops, and the garden is fine. We shall have strawberries and green corn to give away, for there's no sale for anything."

"O dear," sighed Miriam, "there seems always something the matter; either we have no crops when the market is high, or when we have plenty, prices are so low it does not pay to cultivate them. I wish papa would sell or rent the farm, and let us go to town.

Surely we three could earn the living for food in some way, now that papa is so poorly."

"O Miriam!" said Ruth, "you are so silly in your constant cry of 'sell the farm.' We couldn't give it away as real estate is now, and if we could, what should we do in town?
Teach? Not one of us could pass an examination. Clerk? There are a dozen girls already waiting for every vacancy. Sew? We should starve to death waiting to learn what is demanded of a seamstress nowadays.
Then it would kill father to give up the place. Thank goodness, it's not mortgaged, but it's running down, and, girls, papa is failing, and must have help. There he comes now, dear old daddy!" and out she went to meet and help him as the horses come trotting around the house, and stopped at the stable door.

"Barstow's," as it had long been called, was one of the older places in Minnesota. Its block farmhouse and many out-buildings were set back on an old territorial road, its big orchard and oak grove, and its vine-covered porches, not to speak of the lake which was its western boundary, made it a picturesque and an attractive place.

Mr. Barstow, its owner, was a thrifty New Englander, who had once been a wealthy man, but the loss of his wife, after a long illness, and the sudden death of his only son, had broken his spirit, and a succession of poor crops and losses in other ways had reduced him to very narrow means. Lois, with Kirstine's help, did the household work, and Miriam who was a beauty-lover, made the rooms dainty and attractive in numberless ways; but Ruth was her father's real dependence. She knew and loved every animal on the place. She drove the horses in haying and harvesting, when help was scarce. The garden was her care, as was the poultry, and she was so full of resource, her father called her his right hand. Her out-of-door life had made her seem a little hoydenish, but she was a beautiful and lovable girl—a girl still, in spite of her length of limb and her twenty years of life.

"What news in town to-day, daddy, dear?"
asked she, as she helped him unharness the horses.

"Very good news, Ruth, if I were a little more forehanded. Hebb has left his farm, and his man, Lars Larsen, is out of a place and doesn't want to leave the neighborhood.

Our Book

I received in due time your book. When I wrote you, it was one week after I had given Mellin's Food to the baby, then 3 months old, and ill with cholera infantum. I am glad to tell you that in less than 48 hours an improvement began to appear; the baby is well to-day and is the only one saved among 30 or 40 infants in the

AN EVIDENCE OF PROSPERITY.

It is generally conceded by economists who study the commercial situation of the country, that the great arteries of railway travel are a sure indication of its condition. A depression in commercial lines means abandoned business trips and the cancellation of pleasure travel, while a healthy condition of affairs means business trips and an increase of passengers on pleasure bent.

A good evidence that a business revival has gone broadcast over this country is the "Lake Shore Limited," the star train of the Vanderbilt system, between New York and Chicago, which is daily comfortably filled. With a view to taking the best possible care of its patrons, the New York Central has arranged to increase the equipment of this train by placing an additional standard sleeper on the trains every day. To the regular traveler the appointments and comforts of this train are well known, but if you have never made a trip on it, you owe it to yourself to see and enjoy the advance made in comfort and luxury in modern railway travel.
Remember the fare is no higher on this train, except between New York and Chicago, while the accommodations and service place this particular train conspicuously at the head of the list, when compared with other lines.—Albany Journal.

THE LIVING CHURCH March 25th.

But Ruth, he wants $30 a month by the year."

"Well, he's worth it, papa. Why, if we had him the year around, with our good team and farm machinery, you might have a little rest, and everything would go on all right."

"Yes, he is capable, and a good calculator, but his wages would be $360 for the year, and we are behind on last year, and owe for getting in this spring's crop."

Ruth marked her father's dragging step, as they walked to the house, and his pallor half alarmed her throughout the evening.

She lay long awake that night. It was obvious her father must have help. The crops promised well. The wheat crop alone should more than lift them out of debt, and the other crops would pay the ordinary family expenses. But Lars' wages. It seemed such a pity the garden and poultry should bring in no income. But with butter at twelve cents a pound, and eggs and strawberries at whatever one chose to offer for them, there was no hope of income from them, further than to provide an excellent living for the family. Here a thought occurred to her.

"Why not?" said she. "With plenty of young chickens in the yard, more calves than we can winter, a lake at our door stocked with fish, and a garden full of vegetables and berries, and no market for any of them." Ruth sat up in bed in her excitement.

"Why on earth haven't some of us thought of it? We will try it." Then she laughed half aloud as the success of her plan spread itself before her. Ruth lay down, dismissed her worries, breathed a prayer of thankfulness, and went to sleep.

The next morning she saddled old Fan and started off as soon as breakfast was over. "Going for the mail," she called back as the pony racked off down the cottonwood shaded lane. She rode up to the village hotel, and asked to see the landlord, an old friend of the family.

"Ah, Miss Ruth, you are just the one I want to see," said he. Your neighbor, Hebb, has left for the Klondike, and I do not think the new people up there are likely to take his place in caring for my overflow of boarders. Can you help me out? I have five to be cared for at once."

"Who are they?" asked Ruth, not stopping to tell him she had come to ask him to send some nice people to her for the summer.

"Three are college students who want only plenty to eat, and a place to sleep, when they are there. They will be out on their wheels, and on the tramp a good deal of the time. They are able to pay what you ask, but I have told them six dollars a week would be about right."

"And the others?"

"The others are two retired teachers. They want good, clean, comfortable beds, country fare, and a horse to drive any day they may call for it. They will occupy one room, and want to pay $15 a week for the two, the use of the team included."

A little rapid mental arithmetic told Ruth that there would be an income of $132 per month from the five, with nothing to buy but a few groceries, and she closed the bargain at once, feeling sure that Lois' good sense and Miriam's love of company would bring them to approve her enterprise.

On the way home she stopped at Hebb's, and asked Lars to go over to see her father, and as the brawny and civil young Northman walked by the horse's side, he expressed his willingness to assist her in caring for her prospective family of boarders. He was familiar with their wants, and would harness for them or get them boats, or do any of the many things helpless city people are always wanting in the country.

Of course the boarders came, and of course they could not fail to be pleased with their entertainment. The students proved to be three big, jolly boys, full of fun and frolic, who, during the three or four days in the week that they spent at the farmhouse, were a welcome addition to the family life.

The teachers were sweet, refined women, who gave the motherless Barstow girls a great deal more than money in return for the home comforts they enjoyed.

When the young men left, after a three months' sojourn, it was with the understanding that they might return the next summer. As for the ladies autumn came and found them still at the farm, to their entire satisfaction.

One afternoon Ruth, with her hands in her jacket pockets, and standing in a flood of October sunshine, was watching her father polish an oar Lars had just made. She sang:

"And I'll row ye so swift, and I'll row ye so steady,
An' 'tis but a penny to Twickenham Town."

Said one of the ladies who was looking from the open window:

"It is always uplifting to me to hear Ruth sing snatches of that ballad. The words are nothing, but there seems to be such a ring of triumph in her voice."

"When the song ceased they saw Ruth look fondly into her father's happy eyes, and heard her say:

"I am thinking, dear daddy, how rested and well you look."—The Advance.

FOOD AND WEATHER.

Temperature Increased or Reduced by Food.

The old army ration for the tropics has been very sharply criticised, for the reason that it consists of articles of food that any person even slightly acquainted with the elements of food knows is not adapted to the needs of the human system in hot weather. Nature shows forth in the selection of food by inhabitants of various countries; for instance, the Esquimaux in a cold climate selects heavy, carbonaceous foods, tallow, bacon, and such; while the Hindoo and inhabitants of hot countries turn to the cereals for sustenance.

We should follow this hint of nature, and particularly in hot weather should avoid much butter, meat, or any of that class of food. Perhaps a little meat once a day is not amiss, even in hot weather, but the breakfast and lunch should be made of fruit, one or two slices of entire wheat bread, and some Grape-Nuts and cream. Grape-Nuts are mentioned, because they furnish the ideal cereal food in a most palatable and delicious form, in addition to which, they are ready cooked and require no attention whatever from the cook.

A person can pass through weather that may be intensely hot, in a comfortable manner, if the food be properly selected, and the above suggestions can be put into practice with most excellent results.

Finance and Commerce

THE healthfulness and vigor of the business situation in this country seems to have no limit. Each week's statistical reports of the various departments of trade and commerce show a volume in continuous excess of all previous records. Nowhere is there an abatement. In all the leading articles of manufacture prices are still firm and seemingly tending upward. In iron, while a reaction has been generally thought probable, there are yet no signs of it. Prices are, however, changing more slowly than heretofore, and in some classes of goods are stationary. The advance in the last year has been very great, and as a result the production of pig iron in this country is now at the rate of 13,000,000 tons per year, against less than 12,000,000 tons in 1898. The slowness with which plants out of blast can be put into use again is the only reason it is not larger. Quite a sharp break in the price of iron has taken place in Glasgow, where speculation in it is much greater than in this country. Cotton, however, continues to drag in price, due mainly to the estimates for the growing crop. Cotton fabrics are generally firm in tone with better prices in some cases. Wheat made some gain last week. Primary receipts have decreased somewhat, the first rush of winter wheat being over, and the movement of spring only beginning. Export demand has increased somewhat, and stocks are being moderately decreased. Supplies from the Southern Hemisphere are falling off, and European markets have therefore a hardening tendency. It is the opinion of many of the usually best informed in the trade that the shortage in Russia and this country will make itself felt in the price later on. Corn made a gain in price also. There is no material change in the crop outlook, which is generally favorable, but of which the general commercial estimate is doubtless too high. Stocks of old corn are, however, small, the demand, both domestic and foreign, is good, and the market was in an oversold condition, which occasioned the advance. Provisions are about unchanged. A remarkable feature is that live hogs at the stockyards are almost as high as the cured meats, a condition largely due to the depressing effects of fears of yellow fever on speculation.

The financial situation may be called fairly favorable, and here another anomalous condition obtains. At a season of the year when money ordinarily is flowing from the East westward to provide for moving the new crops of grain, the West has furnished the money to relieve the growing stringency in Wall st. Is it more than a question of time when the Mississippi Valley will be the wealthiest centre of civilization in the world? The stock market, with no large volume of speculation, is working steadily upwards, having regained most of the decline made since January and February, and foreigners are good buyers of stock, which they unloaded at much lower prices.

Profitable Commercial Field

A map of America, showing the transportation routes of North, Central, and South America, just issued by the Treasury Bureau of Statistics, gives some interesting data on the relative distance between the commercial centers of the United States and those of other parts of the world via the various existing and proposed water routes. It shows especially the routes followed by steamships in the commerce between the eastern and southern ports of the United States and of Central and South America and the western coast of the U. S. The contrast between the distances now traversed in commerce of eastern United States with western coasts of America, and those which would be made practicable by an Isthmian canal, is interesting. The fact that the Isthmus of Panama lies almost directly south of the Atlantic coast ports, and that all commerce for the western coasts of South America, must now travel eastwardly a distance of over 2,500 miles, and again back to the west a like distance, before reaching the western coast of South America, indicates in some degree the loss of distance and steam power which must be utilized in reaching the western coast of South America, contrasted with that which will be practicable should a water route be opened across the Isthmus. From New York to Valparaiso on the western coast of South America via the Straits of Magellan, is shown to be 8,460 miles, while via Colon and Panama it is but 4,572 miles; while from New York to San Francisco via the Straits of Magellan is 13,090 miles, while via Nicaragua it is 4,867. The commerce of the west coast of South America, as shown by the publication of the Bureau of Statistics which this map accompanies, now amounts to over $100,000,000 annually, and of this sum but $15,000,000 is with the United States. The imports of Chile, Peru, Ecuador, and Bolivia, amounted in 1897 to over $50,000,000, and of this amount less than $5,000,000 was from the United States. Thus in that part of the commerce in which the United States producers and manufacturers are most interested, the export trade, the United States now obtains less than 10 per cent. of the trade of the Pacific coast of South America.

Chile has developed a greater variety of industries, and with greater success than its neighbors lying nearer to the equator. About one half of its population is engaged in agriculture, the wheat product alone being about 28,000,000 bushels, other cereals amounting to about 8,500,000 bushels, besides fruits and vegetables. Sheep and cattle are largely grown, and wool, hides, and leather form the important features of her exports. The most important of the exports, however, is nitrate, the exportation of which is rapidly increasing.

Peru has also an area equivalent to that of California, Oregon, and Washington combined. The imports of Peru in 1897 are given at $8,065,792, of which amount $787,858 or 9.15 per cent., was from the U. S. The chief productions are cotton, coffee, and sugar.

The Care of Gloves

To remove a glove from the hand, take hold at the wrist and turn it wrong side out; then turn it right side out, smooth, and air well before putting away. When black kid gloves become soiled, or worn in spots, or turned white from wear, good authority says to "wet the spots with black ink." A good way is to apply it by means of a bit of flannel on the end of a small stick, then mix a few drops with a teaspoonful of sweet oil, and with a flannel rub the mixture all over the gloves and dry them in the sun. When dry, put them on to stretch them smooth, and polish with a soft flannel. Light-colored gloves which seem to be soiled all over, may be much improved by putting them on and "make believe washing hands" in a pan of white corn meal. They should be washed carefully ten or fifteen minutes, then folded for awhile in a towel with a weight on them. Spots on light gloves may be remedied by dipping a piece of soft flannel in a little ammonia and then rubbing it over a cake of white soap (yellow soap will not do), after which rub the spots diligently, but gently, till they disappear. As the flannel becomes the least bit soiled, change to a clean place or a new piece. Wash gloves, which are still fashionable, may be, I am told, washed very satisfactorily in hot water in which is put one teaspoonful of salad oil, or sweet oil, to every quart of water used, first rubbing all the soiled spots with pure white soap. They should be squeezed, not wrung, shaken out, and dried slowly by a fire, rubbing them occasionally between the hands to soften them—Good House-keeping.

CHLOROFORM is useful for taking paint stains from black silk. Persistent rubbing is necessary. Chloroform will also restore faded plush goods by sponging carefully.

CLEANING AND DYEING FEATHERS.—To dye feathers black, first wash them in a pint of boiling water in which half a teaspoonful of soda has been dissolved; then rinse and put in the dissolved dye as prepared for silk, holding by the tips of the stems and moving in the boiling water. Rinse in cold water, dry between soft cloths, and over a stove, where they may be waved in the warm air. If the feathers come out too light a black, add more dye. Curl with the back of a knife drawn under two or three flues of feathers at a time, after heating the knife slightly over a warm iron, which makes it curl quicker. White feathers may be gently soused in warm soapsuds until clean, rinsed in clear water, and dried and curled according to the plan given for dyed feathers.—Ladies' Home Journal.

RIVERVIEW MILITARY ACADEMY, Poughkeepsie, New York.

Beautifully situated on one of the most picturesque sites along the Hudson River. The equipment of the buildings throughout is of the most modern style, and the sanitary conditions, lighting, ventilating, and heating contrivances are the best that can be obtained. An elevating home life, a broad curriculum of study, under charge of efficient masters, and military discipline form a combination for the education of young men which insures their success in after life. The moral standing of the Academy is exceedingly high. During the sixty-three years of the school's history many men have graduated who to-day are prominent in all branches of profession. Our great aim is to teach the cadets how to study, not simply to impart text-book knowledge. A personal inspection of the school would be greatly appreciated. If this is not possible, an illustrated catalogue will gladly be sent you on application. J. B. BISBEE, A.M., Prin.

COMING WITH APPARENTLY official endorsement is the announcement from Washington that the taking of the Cuban census will mark the beginning of the end of American occupation. This has caused something of a commotion among holders of strong annexation sentiment, who feel that Cuba can be governed wisely and well only if made a part of the United States. As it is not the intention of this government to relinquish control and direction of Cuban affairs until a form of local government shall have been established fully equal to the work of administration, it may be premature for annexationists to criticise the administration of President McKinley. It would seem to be no more than right to permit Cubans to determine what form of government theirs shall be, and if a majority decide an American protectorate or annexation to be best for the future of Cuba, it will then be time to discuss the question. At present it seems out of place.

THE ORIGINAL PURPOSE OF AMERICAN intervention was to alleviate a condition of oppression in Cuba which was not tolerable. This having been accomplished, the duty of the United States to the world is to establish, or see established, a stable government. Having been the instrument of changed conditions in Cuba, this country will still be responsible in a measure for the future, although not in control. No announcement of details of the form of government, other than that it will be Republican, have been made, but it is stated that the compilation of the census will be shortly followed by registration and local elections.

THE INSULAR COMMISSION HAS completed its work of codifying laws for Puerto Rico. It is assumed that for some years, at least, conditions will not permit the adoption of a territorial form of government, nor free trade with the United States. But about ten per cent. of the people of Puerto Rico can read or write any language, although the majority show an eagerness to learn. Another difficulty in the way of territorial government is that its adoption would put in force the Constitution and all its rights, such as trial by jury, etc., and the condition of the natives would not permit this. At present, the President has the power to maintain a military government until Congress legislates to the contrary, and under this form of government he can introduce civil government in a provisional form throughout the island. Latest advices from Puerto Rico are that fully 250,000 people are destitute.

AN EVENT OF INTERNATIONAL interest is the forthcoming race between the yachts Shamrock and Defender, off New York City. For years British designers and builders have endeavored to create a yacht which would take the cup across the water, from whence it was brought by an American yacht, but so far have failed. This year, however, the race possesses unusual interest, for although Defender is a craft able to show a clean pair of heels to any sailing vessel in American waters, English builders have produced in Shamrock a yacht which, so far as observations go, is fully the equal of Defender. Both are marvels of marine architecture, and surpass in speed qualities anything heretofore designed. As a clean, gentlemanly sport, nothing surpasses yachting, so while bearing no ill will toward the English visitors, patriotic Americans will rest their hopes on Defender.

A RECENT CABLEGRAM FROM LONDON states that a Lancashire firm has received an order for ten thousand tons of steel rails from the United States. This report, if true, and judging from the industrial situation there is no reason to doubt its veracity, indicates a condition that is most gratifying, and augurs well for future prosperity. If an American railroad has placed such an order in England, it is simply because American mills are too busy to be looking for more work. The present call for supplies to be shipped to Puerto Rico has revealed a serious shortage in certain lines of wearing apparel, reserve stocks having been depleted by the home demand. With mills and factories running on full time, and a full volume of crops to add to the wealth of the West, the nation finds itself in an enviable position.

DISPATCHES THE PAST WEEK announce the formation of two more trusts, one of Eastern coal mines and coal-carrying railroads, with a capital of $104,000,000; the other, the American Automobile Company, with a capital of $10,000,000, controlling patents in all automotors in which kerosene or gasoline is used. For the past few months the trust industry has languished, partly because there are not many more branches of industry to be combined, and partly because the heavily over-capitalized and waterlogged trust stocks have not been subscribed for by investors. The action of Eastern bankers in refusing to accept stocks of uncertain value as collateral, has also had an effect of injuring the inflation industry.

FROM THE MASS OF WORTHLESS stuff cabled from Rennes anent the Dreyfus case, it is possible to glean a modicum of fact, and this is not encouraging to those who believe in the innocence of the prisoner, and hope to see guilt placed where it seems to properly belong. Members of the general staff appear to possess a faculty of standing by each other, and members of the court-martial apparently back up their superior officers and block efforts of the defence to draw out facts which would be favorable to Dreyfus. The Napoleonic code has its peculiarities, the chief of which is the assumption of guilt which compels a prisoner to prove his innocence. The proceedings of the present court-martial are in some respects painfully similar to those of the body which condemned Dreyfus, and are at variance with the Court of Cassation which ordered a new trial. The latter was animated by a desire to see justice done, while the idea of the present proceeding seems to be that justice lies in the exoneration of the general staff, etc.

ENGLAND MUST MAKE THE NEXT move in the Transvaal. The reply of President Kruger to the proposals of Sir Alfred Milner, British High Commissioner of South Africa, acceded to certain demands, with a proviso that England renounce her sovereignty. As this is a point which England held to be beyond consideration, the matter has not advanced toward a pacific settlement. As arbitration seems to be out of the question, a display of force will likely be next in order. Some British troops have already embarked for South Africa, and the Boers are making military preparations. At the request of England, a large shipment of arms and ammunition passing through the Portuguese port of Lourenco Marques on Delagoa Bay has been stopped, and this the Boers claim is virtually an act of war, as a condition of hostilities does not exist between England and the Transvaal. It is to be hoped an amicable settlement will be reached, and as there can be no doubt of the result of the issue, the Boers will probably have the good sense to concede all reasonable demands.

CHICAGO IS TO HAVE A FALL FESTIVAL early in October, which will not be eclipsed by the festivities attending the arrival of Admiral Dewey in New York city. The Western metropolis will take advantage of the ceremony of laying the cornerstone of the new federal building, and the anniversary of the great fire of 1871, to inaugurate a week of enjoyment which is expected to attract many thousands of visitors. The down-town district will be a maze of decoration and illumination, and the finale will be a charity ball, which is expected to realize not less than $25,000 for sufferers in Puerto Rico. The President, Admiral Dewey, and a host of other notables, including the President of Mexico and the Governor-General of Canada, are expected to gladden the fete by their presence. As a matter of fact, the festivities have already begun for some members of the general committee who are personally delivering invitations in Mexico, Canada, and New York. Great is Chicago, and great will be the fall festival.

Rupert's Land Provincial Synod

At the opening service of the synod held in St. John's cathedral, Winnipeg, Aug. 9th, Bishop Grisdale, of Qu'Appelle, preached the sermon. The business session began in the afternoon. One important matter brought before the synod was the petition of Bishop Newnham, of Moosonee, to divide his immense diocese. A resolution was passed by the House of Bishops, and unanimously concurred in by the Lower House, by which a new diocese is to be formed, to be called the diocese of Keewatin. The Bishop of Moosonee transfers $25,000 from funds under his control, to form a nucleus for the endowment fund of the new diocese, and he retains all the district from a little west of Moose Fort and up the east side of Hudson's Bay. That held this year was the tenth session of the Rupert's Land Synod, nine regular and one special having been held in the twenty-four years since it was first called into existence in 1875. Only four bishops were able to be present this year. Bishop Young, of Athabasca, is still in England, his health having broken down; Bishop Reeve, of Mackenzie River, was unable to leave his work, and Bishop Bompas, of Selkirk, has never left his remote mission in the Far North since his consecration as bishop in 1874. The vast change in the country since the synod was first established is shown by some figures. In 1875 there were only three dioceses outside Rupert's Land, and the total number of clergy in this immense tract of country was only 33, including the four bishops. In the present year there are 185 clergy, with seven bishops. Much credit is given to the Primate, Archbishop Machray, for the development of the country. He began his work as bishop in 1865, on the Red River. Among the matters brought before the synod this year were some changes in the constitution as to the methods of electing bishops. Also a scheme for a clergy superannuation fund and some amended rules for the Widow and Orphans' Fund.

The church of the Redeemer, Toronto, has been renovated and greatly improved, and was open for service Aug. 13th. Ven. Archdeacon Boddy was appointed commissary for the diocese by Bishop Sweatman, to act during the latter's absence in England. The Bishop expects to return by the end of September. A Ladies' Aid Society has been organized in connection with St. George's church, Haliburton. Work on the new rectory in the parish of Omenee and Emily has been begun, and a new church is talked of. St. Paul's church, Mono, has been repainted lately. The new church at Campbell's Cross is well under way, and will be opened in the autumn. Bishop Newnham, of Moosonee, preached to a crowded church at St. Phillips', Toronto, July 30th.

Diocese of Nova Scotia

At the second annual convention of St. George's deanery Sunday schools, held in All Saints' church, Canso, in the end of July, Rural Dean Miller gave an address on Baptism. There was an early celebration of Holy Communion, at which the clergy and visiting delegates were present. After nine years' service, Mr. J. A. Winfield, parish evangelist for St. Paul's church, Halifax, has been obliged to resign on account of ill-health. Addresses of regret and a handsome testimonial were made to him on his departure for England, Aug. 2nd. Mr. E. A. Kenzie who has had large experience of city mission work in New York, and has taken a special course in nursing in Bellevue Hospital, has taken Mr. Winfield's place in St. Paul's parish.

It was expected that the Rev. J. A. Richardson, rector-elect of Trinity church, St. John, vacant by the death of the late Archdeacon Brigstocke, would arrive from Winnipeg to begin his work in St. John by the end of August. By the will of the late W. W. Turnbull, $10,000 was left to the rector, church wardens and vestry of St. John's (stone) church, St. John, in trust for the poor of the city, without distinction of creed or nationality. Work on the Canon Medley Memorial Hall is to be commenced at once. It is at Sussex, and is at some distance from the church.

Bishop Du Moulin, of Niagara, was the preacher at St. John the Evangelist's church, Montreal, Aug. 20th. It is announced that a conference will be held by the Montreal Diocesan College Association, in the college hall, on the 11th and 12th of October. The church of St. James the Apostle, Montreal, is to have a very fine new organ when the other improvements to the building are completed in October. A very important enlargement will also be made in the splendid memorial organ placed in St. George's church, Montreal, three years ago, by a member of the congregation, Mr. James Craithern. He intends to supplement his gift by the addition of solo and echo organs. The total cost of the enlargement will be $4,000. By the new arrangement, it is expected a stimulus will be given to congregational singing. Bishop Whipple, of Minnesota, preached in St. George's church, July 9th, and made a great impression on the congregation. The Dean of Montreal and Mrs. Carmichael have been spending the month of August at York Beach, Maine. St. Barnabas' church, St. Lambert, celebrated the 13th opening of the church in July, with a full choral evening service.

Chicago

Wm. Edward McLaren, D.D., D.C.L., Bishop

The Bishop is expected to return on or about Sept. 15th. He will preside at the consecration of the Rev. Mr. Francis as Bishop of Indiana, in Evansville, on St. Matthew's Day.

This week will see many of the city clergy returning for their autumn work, the absentees being more numerous than in any preceding year. This would seem to be true also of the laity, the diminution of the rural congregations being, however, less noticeable than in the urban.

New York

Henry Codman Potter, D.D., LL.D., Bishop

The church of the Holy Apostles, the Rev. Dr. Backus, rector, is undergoing repairs, and is temporarily closed pending their completion.

At Grace church, the Rev. Wm. R. Huntington, D.D., D.C.L., rector, the repairs recently referred to in the columns of THE LIVING CHURCH, have been completed. An extension of the chancel space is deferred till a future occasion.

At the chapel of the Incarnation, the Rev. Henry R. Wadleigh, vicar, the fresh-air work is on an improved method this summer, the result of experiments tried last year. Under the matron's efficient management, with the co-operation of two assistants, careful discipline and economy are maintained.

Choir Outing

The choir boys of St. Paul's church, Sing Sing, accompanied by the rector, the Rev. Chas. Martin Niles, D.D., camped out on High Tour mountain, near Haverstraw, returning Aug. 19th.

The Rev. Chas. Howard Malcolm, D.D.,

former secretary of the American Church Building Fund Commission, died at his summer place at Newport, R. I., Aug. 19th, after a long illness extending over the summer months.

Bequest to Trinity Church

Trinity church, the Rev. Morgan Dix, D.D., D.C.L., rector, has just received by the will of the late Edwin Welch, of this city, a legacy of $1,000, for the care of the Welch plot in the parish cemetery.

To Aid a Good Work

An effort is making by the Rev. Alexander W. Bostwick, of Calvary parish clergy staff, to provide for urgent need of the City Hospital and Dispensary, which ministers to incurable consumptives.

The Girls' Friendly Society has been conducting a very successful summer work at its new recreation house, located at Huntington, L. I. The house is so well adapted to the uses of the society, that an effort is making to secure it permanently by purchase.

Work in Cuba

The result of recent effort to stir interest in behalf of religious work in Cuba, has been so far successful that funds are in hand by which a building in Matanzas has been bought, and will be fitted and furnished by the American Church Missionary Society for use as an orphan asylum.

Anniversary Commemorated

At St. Agnes chapel of Trinity parish, the anniversary of the death of the late vicar, the Rev. Edward A. Bradley, D.D., was commemorated on Sunday, August 20th. The present vicar asked the congregation to make special intention in memory of Dr. Bradley at the Eucharist; and the hymn was sung, "For all the saints who from their labors rest."

The Former Site

of Columbia University has almost entirely passed out of the hands of the trustees of that institution, only a few lots remaining unsold. Only one of the buildings, Hamilton Hall, will remain, it having passed into the use of Berkeley School. A bronze tablet will be placed on the corner of the building, recording the former occupation of the site by Columbia University.

Dr. De Costa Resigns

The rector of the church of St. John the Evangelist, the Rev. Benjamin F. De Costa, D.D., has resigned his rectorship. The resignation was presented to the vestry about two months ago, but was announced publicly only on Aug. 23d, and has not yet been acted upon. The reason given is that Dr. De Costa desires to relinquish the burden of duty to younger shoulders.

Ordination Service

At the Ordination, Sunday, Aug. 20th, of Mr. John Tilley, Jr., in the chapel of St. Peter's church, Westchester, Bishop Seymour, of Springfield, officiated for Bishop Potter. The instrumental music was in charge of Mr. Geo. F. Le Jenne, organist of St. John's chapel, Trinity parish, and the choir boys were under the direction of Mr. Thomas Harrington, choir-master of the parish. The rector, the Rev. Dr. Frank M. Clendenin, returned from vacation to be present at the service.

Men's Club Growing

At St. Bartholomew's parish house, New York city, the men's club has increased in membership to about 500. It is noteworthy that a considerable proportion of members are those who have been promoted from the Boys' Club. The average daily attendance at the club rooms is 130, and "Ladies' evenings" are a monthly feature. A series of free lectures has been delivered as a new step, with entire success. Another advance is the establishment of a class in history and literature, under an experienced teacher.

Pennsylvania

Ozi William Whitaker, D.D., LL.D., Bishop
St. Peter's Church, Great Valley,

Which has been closed for over four years, has been recently repaired, and was re-opened for divine service on Sunday afternoon, 27th ult., the Rev. Edgar Cope, of Philadelphia, officiating. The choir of St. Peter's church, Phoenixville, rendered the musical portion of the service. This church, as its corporate title indicates, is located in the "Great Chester Valley," out of the usual lines of travel, as they now exist. In colonial days it was one of the very few churches in that region, its parishioners driving many miles to attend service.

Church Work among the Deaf

Is energetically carried on by the Rev. J. M. Koehler, rector of All Souls' church for the deaf, Philadelphia, not only in his cure, but in other parts of the diocese of Pennsylvania, and at various points in the dioceses of Central Pennsylvania (20 in number), Delaware, and New Jersey. The Rev. O. J. Whildin is now the diocesan missionary in those fields, under the direction of the respective bishops. During the mission year in the diocese, 243 services were held. During the past 10 years, there have been at All Souls', and in the field of which it is the centre, 4,500 services.

Reversionary Bequests

The contents of the will of the late Dr. Charles Stille were made public by the Register on the 23d ult. The valuation of the estate is placed at $158,470. The income of same is to be paid to his widow, and upon her decease, after a few minor legacies have been paid, the following bequests are made: To the Church Home for Children, $5,000, "to establish and maintain perpetually and exclusively a scholarship or bed with the income thereof," in memory of his wife. To the Home of the Merciful Saviour, $5,000, for the endowment of a bed, "in memory of my beloved daughter," to be known as the "Anne Dullas Stille bed." There is also a bequest of $10,000 to the Historical Society of Pennsylvania (of which Dr. Stille had been for some time prior to his death the president), the income of said sum to be paid for indexing and arranging genealogical documents, etc., to be known as the "Stille trust." By a codicil, dated Jan. 10th, 1899, the residuary estate is to be divided into three parts: One portion is to go to Yale University, as a permanent fund; another third is left to the Historical Society, for the purpose of erecting an additional and much-needed building, and the remaining third is bequeathed to Gloria Dei (Old Swedes') church, Philadelphia, in whose cemetery repose the mortal remains of his paternal ancestors, from the days of Olaf Stille in the 17th century.

The Philadelphia P. E. City Mission

The 29th annual report of this important and far-reaching work will shortly be issued, and is replete with statistics of its operations among the lowly and the sick, both in body and soul. In addition to its nine clerical city missionaries, it has a large number of lay-helpers, both men and women, and quite a large staff of physicians. On every Lord's Day during the year services are held in various localities, and every week one or more "volunteer" clergymen do duty in different institutions; and when the Pennsylvania training ship, "Saratoga," is in port the sailor boys are not neglected, but are ministered unto by devoted laymen. One hundred and ten different institutions were visited during the mission year; the number of religious services, including daily prayers in the three "Homes" of the mission, were 4,017; the clerical and lay missionaries made 24,150 visits to the sick, and the superintendent, the Rev. Dr. H. L. Duhring, some 1,500 in addition. From the seven sick-diet kitchens, 90,966 meals were given out, and a large amount of supplies. The receipts for the year, from all sources, were $74,519.17; expenditures, including repairs and improvements, $74,144.18. A very complimentary letter is appended, from the general secretary of the National Relief Commission, thanking the City Mission and its able superintendent for the valuable assistance rendered the main organization.

Albany

William Crosswell Doane, D.D., LL.D., Bishop
Service for Deaf-mutes

On the 11th Sunday after Trinity, at 5 o'clock Evensong, the general missionary to the Mid-Western deaf-mutes, was welcomed at Trinity church, Potsdam. A fine congregation, including several deaf-mutes, attended. Prayers and addresses were given in the sign language. On the morning of the same Sunday, the Bishop of Duluth preached a sermon at Potsdam.

Work at Ogdensburg

St. John's, Ogdensburg, is doing good work in this city. At this church, the Bishop of Duluth officiated on the evening of the 1st Sunday after Trinity, preaching to a large congregation, where he had served as rector for 23 years. The Bishop left the next day for his diocese, having spent about two weeks at his cottage, near Chantegay.

The Tupper Lake Mission

Efforts, more or less successful, have been employed for a few years by the Bishop of the diocese, seconded by the clergy of the archdiocese, to establish a permanent mission at Tupper Lake, in the Adirondacks. When the prospect of building a church here seemed about to be realized, Dr. Seward Webb who owns large landed estates in that neighborhood, offered a liberal donation towards this object, which, however, seems abortive, as the village of 3,000 souls was practically wiped out of existence by a disastrous fire.

Michigan

Thomas F. Davies, D.D., LL.D., Bishop
Mission at East Jackson

Through the efforts of the Rev. Arthur Beaumont and faithful Church people, a mission has been organized at East Jackson. The guild and Sunday school are well started, and the outlook is most encouraging.

Western Michigan

George De Normandie Gillespie, D.D., Bishop
Memorial Service

The charming summer resort of Wequetonsing was thrown into great grief at the news of the death of Mrs. Tuttle, wife of the Bishop of Missouri. Bishop Tuttle had made Wequetonsing his summer home for very many years, and his pretty cottage is well known there. Both he and his wife have greatly endeared themselves to the dwellers in the little hamlet, by their courtesy and gracious hospitality. At the same hour as the funeral services in St. Louis, a memorial service was held in the little chapel of St. John, in the adjoining village of Harbor Springs, where the Bishop's family always worshipped. This service was conducted by the Rev. Wm. Elmer, priest-in-charge, assisted by the Rev. Dr. Locke, of Chicago. The altar and sanctuary were beautifully decorated by dear friends of Mrs. Tuttle, and the chapel was filled by a sympathizing congregation. Addresses were made by Mr. Elmer and Dr. Locke. Hymns of hope and faith were sung, and the burial office was solemnly said. This service was very comforting to all who knew and loved Mrs. Tuttle.

Colorado

John Franklin Spalding, Bishop

The Ven. R. T. Radcliffe and wife have just returned to Colorado from a most enjoyable visit to Canada, the Archdeacon's home for 20 years. He visited his first mission of 1878, and at 6 A.M. on a July morning, 25 persons received the Blessed Sacrament at the hands of their first priest at that little village altar. Twenty other places were visited, and among them Ottawa, where the Archdeacon was the guest of his Lordship, Bishop Hamilton.

Delaware

Leighton Coleman, D.D., LL.D., Bishop
Calvary Church, Wilmington,

The Rev. H. W. Cunningham, rector, has, in addition to improvements made last December, been further adorned with six stained glass windows, the memorial gifts of members of the parish.

Raising of Church Flag

Under most delightful weather conditions, on St. Bartholomew's Day, Bishop Coleman raised to the breeze, on a 60-foot pole at Bishopstead, the first Church flag in the United States. Not only is this the only Church flag in America, but also, so far as known, it is the only distinctive Church flag in the world. It is nine feet, six inches square, the square form being the more ancient and the more heraldic. The technical description of the flag is as follows: "Barry of 13 gules and argent on an inescutcheon argent of seven-thirteenths a cross patonce perpure." Which, being translated, means that the flag has 13 bars of red and white bunting alternately, with a centre field of white, in which is an Episcopal cross in purple. The field of the cross is seven bars wide. Shortly before 7 o'clock in the morning the Church standard was first raised. The Bishop said the Invocation. The flag will be flown on all holy days.

Ohio

Wm. Andrew Leonard, D.D., Bishop

The Rev. E. W. Worthington has been taking a trip up the lakes, accompanied by his son and his two daughters. The services at Grace church during his absence have been taken by the Rev. C. C. Kemp, of St. Luke's church.

Clerical Changes

The Rev. Wemyss T. Smith has accepted a call to St. Matthew's church, Bloomington, Ill., and has resigned the charge of the church of the Good Shepherd, East Madison ave., and the church of the Incarnation, Glenville. The Rev. E. S. Doan, of Bellevue, will become rector of the church of the Good Shepherd, and the Rev. John Chandler White, of Hartwell, a suburb of Cincinnati, will take charge of the church of the Incarnation.

Summer Services

The church of the Transfiguration, among the pines on little mountain, has been kept open every Sunday during the season. The following clergymen have officiated during the summer: Bishop Leonard, Dean Williams, Canon Hall, Canon Watson, Dr. McGrew, the Rev. Messrs. E. L. Kemp, J. H. W. Blake, W. H. Jones.

Oklahoma and Indian Territory

Francis Key Brooke, D.D., Missionary Bishop
New Mission Church

On the 12th Sunday after Trinity, Aug. 20th, Bishop Brooke, assisted by the minister-in-charge of the mission, the Rev. Franklin C. Smith, laid the corner-stone of the church to be built at St. Stephen's mission, Chandler, Oklahoma, in the presence of a large gathering of Church people and interested town's people. The church is to be built of the native stone, which is found in abundance near the town, and when completed will be the first stone church in the jurisdiction. The funds for this building have been gathered by the faithful and hard-working guilds of the older and the young women of the mission, covering a period of several years of work, and with liberal subscriptions from the town, and a small debt to our own Building Fund Commission, it is hoped to provide the whole cost by the mission's own efforts. The cost of the building when completed will be $1,100, not an extravagant sum for so permanent and churchly a building.

Massachusetts

William Lawrence, D.D., Bishop

In St. George's church, Lee, the Rev. F. E. Atkins, rector, the Holy Eucharist is now said on Sundays at 7:30 and on Holy Days at 10:30.

Editorials and Contributions

INCREASING prevalence of the vacation habit is plainly evident in the aspect of the summer congregations. More and more, even in suburban and rural districts, the ordinary worshippers are missed from their familiar places through the heated term, and the seats are occupied by strangers. All branches of Church work suffer temporarily by this change, and in most parishes it is becoming an accepted fact that the organizations of the parish must take a vacation rest. Under some conditions, this may be a benefit in the end; under others, quite the reverse. It depends on the character of the vacation. If it is one only for mind and body, all will be well, even better; but if the people have made this summer outing an entire vacation from spiritual activities and interests, they will find it a difficult matter to restore their interest on their return, and the activity of Christian life will be distinctly felt as only a burden, to cease from which will be the temptation and the tendency. Never was the apathy more noticeable than during the recent season. It is to be hoped that the recovery may be equally phenomenal.

A PROTESTANT faction in Ireland is displaying extraordinary jealousy of "innovations" in the services of the Church. It has been remarked that usages which are accepted as a matter of course in the Presbyterian Kirk of Scotland, are the occasion of wild excitement when they appear in the Episcopal Church of Ireland. This has been illustrated by the case of St. Clement's, Belfast, with its extraordinary history of rioting and violence. It might be imagined that some very extreme kind of "ritualism" had begun to develop itself in the unfortunate Church of Ireland, in spite of its rigidly Protestant canons. We turn with interest to a list of offensive customs which a certain Protestant society is determined to put down. They are such as these—the rising of the congregation at the entrance or exit of the clergy; turning away from the people after the sermon (which is called a "ceremony"); turning to the East at the Creed; wearing a cassock; delivery of the "Communion bread" into crossed hands; "ceremonial" carrying of the Communion vessels from or to the vestry by the clergy; the standing for a hymn, or for any other reason, during the offertory; the formal placing of the offering on the table; and the giving of the benediction by the priest with uplifted hands and extended fingers. Upon reading this catalogue of things to be "put down," one marvels to think what must be the character of the Church service which commends itself to the minds of men capable of framing such an indictment. Unfortunately, such people are always telling us what we must not do, but they rarely take the pains to express themselves affirmatively. But this is the character of Protestantism. It is negative, not positive.

WE find in The Church in Japan for July, a notice of the change which will be brought about in the status of foreigners, under the operation of the new treaties. They will no longer have the benefit of extra-territoriality, but will be subject to the laws of Japan, precisely as foreigners residing in the United States are subject to its laws. As we understand it, the new order of things gives entire liberty of movement to strangers, and to that extent promises to be an advantage to missionary work. But a decided disadvantage is the income tax, which does not spare the meagre salaries of the missionaries. It will probably amount to three or four per cent.—a deduction which, as The Church in Japan says, will be a serious thing to many families who are now barely able to keep out of debt. There has already been an upward tendency in prices, which, within six years, has doubled the cost of living. We are told, incidentally that under the new press regulations, the magazine will not be able to discuss political questions. This is unfortunate, inasmuch as many such questions are liable to touch the interests of missions very closely. It will be necessary, we suppose, to look to other sources of information in regard to the educational movements, which, at present, threaten to hamper mission work in a most serious manner. Perhaps the inherent importance of the subject will at length force itself upon the attention of the managers of The Spirit of Missions.

The Decision

THE English Archbishops have rendered their decision on the legality of the use of lights carried in processions, and of incense in the services of the Church. They declare against both these usages. The document is very clear. No one can complain of any obscurity or ambiguity. The basis of the decision has come as a surprise to all parties. It is the Act of Uniformity which accompanied the Elizabethan Prayer Book of 1559. With this the convocation had nothing to do, but the Archbishops hold that the Church, nevertheless, "fully accepted the Act at the time, and its authority was never questioned." The crucial words in the Act are those in which the clergy are ordered to "say and use" the several services of the Church "in such order and form as is mentioned in the said Book," and "none other or otherwise." The expression, "none other or otherwise," is taken as "clearly meant to exclude all variations." It is this expression thus interpreted which is applied to rule out both the ceremonies under consideration. It has, as might be expected, been pointed out that this principle, if pressed to its full value, would cut very deep. In their remarks on the carrying of lights in procession, they say there is no authority for such processions, and they are neither enjoined nor permitted. But the argument would equally exclude the carrying of banners, processional crosses, or crosiers in procession, and, probably, even processions as such, whether anything is carried or not. But if the Archbishops are right in their interpretation of the law, it was no part of their business to consider the consequences.

IN itself, the matter of lights in procession is of small importance. The Archbishops say that "the ceremonies of carrying lights about have a different character from "lighting up the church for the purpose of adding to its beauty or its dignity," or hanging up banners, decorating with flowers or with holly, or the like." We confess that we are not learned enough to understand the essential difference. But it is clear that the use of incense is another matter. It is intimately connected with the sacrificial aspect of the Eucharist. It is a ceremonial adjunct which indicates to the eye what the action involves, a solemn oblation to Almighty God. The Archbishops ably defended this doctrine as set forth in the English service, in their letter to the Pope some years ago. In deciding against the legality of incense, therefore, as an accompaniment of the Eucharistic action, they are not in any way attacking the doctrine which it is intended to emphasize. They are simply forced to condemn the ceremony by the premises which they have assumed. But they do so with some apparent reluctance. They think it might have been possible to simplify the ceremonial while still retaining it. But it was easier three hundred years ago to get rid of a complicated ceremonial by disuse than by modification. The Archbishops take the pains to observe further, "that even now the liturgical use of incense is not by law permanently excluded from the Church's ritual," and in confirmation of this, cite the section in Elizabeth's Act which allows the Crown, with the consent of the Archbishop of Canterbury, to order new ceremonies. It would thus be possible to include the use of incense in the ceremonial of some great occasion. "In conclusion," the Archbishops say, "we are far from saying that incense in itself is an unsuitable or undesirable accompaniment to divine worship. The injunction for its use by divine authority in the Jewish Church would alone forbid such a conclusion. But this is not the question before us."

BUT far more interesting and important than the permission or exclusion of the ceremonial itself, is the ground on which the decision is based. It is this which will be examined most narrowly by thoughtful people, and which will in the end determine the question whether this decision is to make for the peace of the Church. First, the Archbishops adopt as determining their conclusions, an Act of Parliament; that is, the law of the State, not of the Church, and they apparently admit that the law of the Church, apart from this, would not be conclusive, inasmuch as the Church has never legislated on the matters in question. Nevertheless, they take the tacit acquiescence of the Church in the Act as equivalent to such legislation. The difficulties in which the whole matter is involved are seen when we observe that precisely the opposite position seems to be involved in the opinion expressed last spring by, we believe, a majority of the English episcopate, that the universal acceptance by the Church of the "authorized version" of the Scriptures for over two hundred years, did not make that version exclusively lawful, in the absence of definite legislation. In the second place, the Archbishops adopt the Act of Uniformity of 1559 as their starting point, with an interpretation. This was, no doubt, unavoidable, yet it certainly furnishes matter for discussion. Unquestionably there are those who are prepared to take the ground that the addition of a ceremonial adjunct, without departure from the words or directions of the Prayer Book, is no violation of this law.

OF course it is the fact that the law on which the decision rests was an Act of Parliament, which will arouse the most feeling and cause the most searchings of heart. It seems to be in the teeth of the principle enunciated by the Church Union last spring, that the Church cannot submit to have either its faith or worship directed or controlled by parliamentary law. It is certain that any attempt on the part of Parliament, as it is now constituted, to deal directly with such subjects, would produce an unparalleled commotion. But there is a distinction between Parliament as it now is, and Parliament as it was three centuries ago. Its members then were communicants of the Church. Now no religious qualification is necessary. It might have been at least tolerable then to submit to such legislation. Now it is intolerable. Every conception of natural justice is against the notion that the faith and worship of a religious body should be subject to the control of those who are not of it, who are even intensely antagonistic to it. Probably the English mind will, in the present instance, find some comfort in this distinction between the state of things in the past and in the present. Still more to the point, as it seems to us, is the fact, which, as we have said, is made clear by the decision, that the Church of England, as such, has never pronounced against the use of incense, and that it cannot be said to be "an unsuitable or undesirable accompaniment to divine worship." The importance of this utterance may be estimated by imagining for a moment that the Archbishops had considered themselves compelled to say that the use of incense was contrary to the mind of the Church of England and opposed to her doctrine of the Eucharist!

THE situation is serious. Everything depends upon the way in which this decision is received. By bringing out so sharply the relation of the State to the matters in question, the Archbishops have certainly shown themselves less adroit than Archbishop Benson in the famous Lincoln case, who carefully evaded this question. Nevertheless, it is a perennial problem and, sooner or later, it must come up for final settlement. It may be that hereafter this decision, curiously lacking in that spirit of compromise which is at the same time aluded to as the natural way of Englishmen, will hereafter be notable as having advanced the discussion of this vexed question by an important stage toward a satisfactory solution. At the present writing, it is impossible to say what action will be taken by those chiefly concerned. So far as can be made out from the few interviews which have appeared, the Low Churchmen, such as Mr. Austin Taylor, of Liverpool, and the notorious Mr. Kensit, have no feeling but contempt for the Archbishops and their decision; while the High or "advanced" section are in some uncertainty. On the whole, it seems likely that there will be a very general acquiescence in the decision, though perhaps under a formal protest.

A DECISION which bases itself upon an Act of Parliament and not upon either canonical or rubrical law, has little bearing upon the Church in this country. It is impossible that we should derive our ceremonial or other regulations from such a source. The American Church broke finally with any and all Acts of Conformity when she revised the Prayer Book, after the Revolutionary War. We are under ecclesiastical, not civil, law in all matters of belief and worship. And we have our own methods of interpreting the law. Much more liberty is left to the parish priest than is the case in England, and the Jus Liturgicum which appertains to the bishops in matters not otherwise defined covers a wider field. It is a condition of things which admits of great variations in different dioceses and in different parishes of the same diocese. It is well that it should be so, since otherwise the Church could hardly fulfill her mission, or adapt herself to the needs of a heterogeneous population. According to the Archbishops, it is the State in England which excludes the Church from making use of a ceremonial which they acknowledge to be suitable, desirable, and Scriptural. No such barrier exists here. Accordingly, without infringing upon the restrictions imbedded in our rubrical law, such ceremonial will, among us, stand simply on its merits.

Material Wealth

FROM A SERMON BY THE BISHOP OF
NEW YORK, 1899

IF material wealth be the end of being;—if the accumulation of millions be the worthiest aim of human ambition;—if the building of palaces or the buying of legislatures be the finest and highest distinction possible to modern manhood, then we must needs look in the face the perils that in our time and in our land they increasingly involve. In the century in which you and I live, what we call civilization has undergone what (though, as yet, we do not recognize its tremendous proportions) is nothing less than a gigantic revolution. The utter disappearance, under the influence of modern invention and the transformation of its mechanical methods, of the working man's life as it existed under our earlier social conditions; the huge aggregations of capital which have practically taken out of the hand of the individual the independent disposition of his labor, and have introduced into his existence a paralyzing uncertainty as to both his circumstances and his future; the gradual widening of the breaches that separate classes from classes; and the competitions that, while they cheapen the necessities of life, seem daily to increase the elements of perplexity and uncertainty as to how great multitudes may obtain them;—all these are features of our modern situation full of uncertainty and full of danger.

For one I have no smallest hope that any mechanism of legislation, any system of socialism, or of communism, any schemes of agrarian distribution or taxation, will in the remotest degree reach or remove them. The Church of God, my brothers, must go up, and must stay up, upon a much higher plane than that! One there was who, being confronted with a question like to these, lifted the whole business of human possessions and human relations up into its true light. "Take heed," He said, "and beware of covetousness; for a man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth."

There is no one of us, I presume, who has thought at all, and dreamed at all, who has not at some time or other had his dream of how, if he could construct human society, or create some guild or brotherhood of human fellowship with which to do it, he would go to work. May I tell you mine?

One thing is certain: that thing which we call the social order, tradition, ideal, whatever we may deem it, has never been greatly influenced save by some organized endeavor. One man like John the Baptist may cry aloud in the wilderness. But after John comes Jesus, and calls about Him men like-minded unto Himself, breathes into them a new enthusiasm, and quickens them with a new ideal. So it has always been; so it must always be.

And so, therefore, it must be, to-day. The pre-eminent danger to our social order in this day and age is, first, the growth of wealth, and then the abuse of it. Now then, you remember what were called the sumptuary laws, which undertook, from the time of the Dorians in Greece down and on to the time of Edward the Fourth in England and James the Second in Scotland, to regulate people's expenditures, and to restrict individual luxury or ostentation within very austere bounds. A Dorian or Spartan woman could not wear gold; a Roman woman could not possess a dress of different colors, nor ride, in the city, in a carriage. Tiberius Cæsar forbade the wearing of silk by men; Charles the Fifth prohibited long-pointed shoes; Edward the Second issued a proclamation that no dinner should consist of more than two courses; and James the First, unfaithful verily to the tradition of Scotland, but mindful, doubtless, of the horrors of dyspepsia, forbade the use of pies to all persons under the rank of a baron; all of which Adam Smith, as some of you will doubtless remember, calls "the impertinence of kings and ministers of State," and points out to be as false in its principle as it was impotent in its effect.

And yet, has it ever occurred to anybody to consider what, sooner or later, would be the effect upon the mass of their fellow-beings if a company or fellowship of men and women of recognized social leadership should bind themselves together to illustrate in their habit of life simplicity of attire, modesty of equipage, inexpensiveness in the appointments, and chasteness in the aspect, proportions, furniture, and decorations of their dwellings;—should further bind themselves to discourage the habit of excessive accumulation; to employ for art, science, philanthropy and religion all beyond a certain proportion of their income; should devote a certain fixed time in every day to other human interests than their own; should devise, and themselves co-operate in, plans for softening the rigors of life, to the less fortunate, and in bringing into the dull monotony of the modern conditions of manual labor, so far as might be, brightness and cheer; of seeking, in one word, to redeem our modern life from the tawdry, sordid, self-indulgent aspect which is too often at what we call "the top," its dominant and prevailing note? For myself, I believe that, wild and visionary as such a suggestion doubtless sounds to many who hear me to-night, that there are men and women in far greater numbers than most of us dream of, who would hail it as, for themselves, at any rate, a way out of a situation which, with our modern extravagance on the one hand, and our modern conditions of poverty, degradation, and despair largely untouched, unrecognized, and unredeemed, on the other, is, to many earnest natures, as intolerable as it is appalling.

For, whether all of us recognize it or not, my brothers, I rejoice to believe that there is a steadily growing minority among us who have found out, to their great joy and enlargement, that He who was Himself the Truth spoke a transcendent and eternally regnant truth when He said: "A man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth." They have touched a higher joy in life than that, and struck a deeper note! They have found the joy of loving and the joy of serving. They have seen the glazed eye of despair brighten at their coming, and the hard note of hatred die out of the voices that answered them. They have learned their Master's secret of giving themselves for men, and they refuse to go below it. Learn you, my friends, the same secret, and help to make other men learn it, and then, one day this old world of ours shall wear its new face, and Christ shall come again!

"Christian Science"

TO know just how the Christian world received Mrs. Eddy's revelation, it is only necessary to say that her Christian Science undertook, at the very start, to remove the fundamental imperative of Christianity itself. Almost the very first declaration of her book is set forth in this extraordinary bit of logic:

"The Scriptures declare that God is Love. He is therefore Principle, not Person."

"The mortality of matter confirms the conclusion that it never originated in the immortal. That spirit created matter is an erroneous premise."

To say that Christian Theism would for a moment stop to reason with any such propositions as these would be doing great injustice to the dignity of a mature body of thought that has no time to teach the alphabet of intelligence to every newcomer who proposes to undermine it. The reply of Christianity, if indeed it has made any, to Mrs. Eddy's statement is about to this effect: "This may be science, and in competent hands might be philosophy, but it is not Christian." The reply of science is similar: "This babble about the mortality of matter, in the face of the generally accepted conclusion that matter is indestructible, may be Christian, but it is not science."

It is when the scientists issue forth as healers that Christian charity cannot avoid a collision with them, for in the doctrine and practice of their healing they belittle the mission of the Christian founder to a merely medicinal purpose. That they have made the evangel of Christ a pathological event must be apparent to any one who listens to them or who reads the vaticinations of their mother. The obvious answer of Christianity in all its numerous sects is this: "If Christ's mission was merely to abate or to cure those physical evils which man suffers as a penalty for his own sins or those of his fathers, then His mission among mankind was one of the most pitiable failures of which history makes any record. Out of the millions of suffering mortals on this planet, He cured or alleviated a few score of invalids in an obscure country, and left the sum total of disease and suffering in the world undisturbed. That Christ did not intend that man should make any such mistake with regard to His mission, He takes occasion continually to inform the people that His miracles are not performed with the purpose of showing a physician's skill or of establishing a new method of curing, 'but that ye may know that the Son of Man hath power on earth to forgive sins.'"

In so far, therefore, as Mrs. Eddy's therapeutics claim to be Christian, they are based upon a monstrous misconception of Christ's human mission, and fly squarely in the face of theistic philosophy, which not only declares that the course of human suffering was not arbitrarily interfered with, but that it ought not to have been interfered with, and that such interference would not have been a blessing.

Observation of the best example of Christian healing brings out this misconception continually. The most earnest and sincere of the disciples get to believe that they are carrying on Christ's work by the exaltation of their volition in the task of abolishing evil both as a concept and as a fact. They devote themselves to the doctoring habit until the exercise of their introspective credulity confuses and clouds all the ordinary criteria of truth. And this is what Mrs. Eddy calls science.

Every physician will tell you that he meets daily in his practice the idiosyncrasies upon which Christian Science is built, and has to employ mystery and summon credulity to his aid in order to get any mental assistance from his patient. Any cult which makes its appeal to these conditions will gather into its ranks all the perturbed mystics, the overweening idealists, the valetudinarians, and the gentle pagans who will not sit down thirteen at a table, but who read awe-struck about the seven seals, and skim the Sermon on the Mount, and the egoists who buy all the proprietary medicines in turn and believe in each for three months.

Mrs. Eddy appears to have had from the first an instinctive knowledge of these human conditions. When she began her ministrations she came boldly before her susceptible subjects in propria persona. But, as her sybilline utterances excited inquiry and demanded explanation, she receded from view. She passed, as a Boston woman fondly said to me, from an Ideation to an Idolon. This retrocession of the mother from an effluence to an influence was not only a politic move, it was a necessity. To stand boldly forth and try to untangle the confusion she had made of science and Christian faith, or to reason convincingly of either righteousness or recipes, was out of the question. Her parting injunction was: "Don't argue, don't answer questions. Read the Key to the Scriptures and hold me in thought." Any other course would have been suicidal. Leaving Christianity and science out of view, there would be sure to pop up at some time an impertinent horse-sense that would demand explanation of such revelations as that one may find on page 354 of "Science and Health." It is as follows:

"Bathing and rubbing to alter the secretions, or remove unhealthy exhalations from the cuticle, receive a useful rebuke from Christian healing. We must beware of making clean the outside of the platter only. The scientist takes the best care of his body when he leaves it most out of his thought."

If Mrs. Eddy consistently practices what she preaches, her retirement from personal contact with her Church offers us in conduct a more rational measure than is anywhere discoverable in her revelations, for, as Carlyle says somewhere: "So cunningly does the mother of all guide us on our way, not by disclosing to us but, at the right time, by hiding from us.—J. P. M. in the New York Evening Post."

The Brotherhood of St. Andrew

THE annual meeting (extending over a fortnight) of "readers" of various dioceses in England, held at Keble College, Oxford, terminated on the 12th inst., and during this period, various conferences were held under the Rev. J. Murray, dean and fellow of Emmanuel College, Cambridge. One of these meetings dealt with the Brotherhood of St. Andrew. It was opened by Mr. H. Cutting who said that, as in America, so in England, this movement was spreading, and that in England during the past month the number of chapters had increased by 50 per cent. They had now in the United States about 1,500 of these centres. The work of the Brotherhood man was to emphasize the responsibility of every Christian for his godless neighbor, and this was done by making an effort each week to bring him nearer to God, and a prayer each day that this effort might be blessed. Their work in the parish might be, for instance, visiting, often to go out in twos—in some, courage might be lacking—and so their efforts were both co-operative and individual. They must be loyal to their clergymen, and a probation for the men was needful before a charter was granted. In a recent case, after 12 months' probation, only two men were left, and on application being made a charter was issued. He hoped that his few remarks might elicit questions, which would be answered to the best of his power.

The Rev. M. Furse, dean of Trinity College, Oxford, referred to what the B. S. A. had done, and he had seen something of its work in the University of Oxford. He was fundamentally opposed to all new organizations, but the proof of the pudding was in its eating, and the work of the B. S. A. in America and in Canada was really very remarkable. Each man was helping the man next to him. It was a difficult business, as it was much easier to speak about religion to the man in the slums than to the man you knew intimately. The B. S. A. represented men, and if a chapter was working well, men were sticking to the chapter, and the chapter was sticking to the men. The hardest work of that kind was in a university. Its value there was that it gave guidance and help to men who were not quite strong enough to stand by themselves. It had left its mark for good in one college at any rate, to his certain knowledge. They might make mistakes, but if so, these had not been heard of—these had not been detected. What recommended it to the common sense of Churchmen was its simplicity. It was doing solid, real good. There was no nonsense about it. It went straight to the point, and did its work in a quiet way. At a recent public meeting he had heard an American say: "We call it the Brotherhood of St. Andrew, because, when St. Andrew discovered it, he switched himself right on to it, and when he had switched himself on, he then switched his brother on as well!"

Mr. H. Clark urged that the B. S. A. was an organization of Church laymen whose one aim was to help on their brothers in their life on earth. It was universally agreed that organization was a necessary condition to the success of any important movement, and the work of their brotherhood, which was now a world-wide one in the Anglican Communion, was for an important purpose; viz., to arouse men to a sense of their responsibility for their brother men, and in a humble and unostentatious manner to bear witness to Christ. In the early centuries, the Christian layman, say at Rome, was the acting propagandist of the new Christian faith. In this work he succeeded. He was a capable, effective, trained soldier, and, through his superior moral powers, he overcame his pagan neighbors. He carried in his person and in his life the marks of a real Christianity, and it is this picture of an active Church layman that the Brotherhood of St. Andrew desired to reproduce to-day. And there was another aim it had in view, which was to destroy that dreadful feeling of religious selfishness which—forgetting to ask the question: "Am I my brother's keeper?"—was working for a solitary salvation. Instead of such a theory being a help, it was in effect destructive to the attainment to eternal life. Those two lines by Lowell should never be forgotten:

"Heaven's gate is shut to him who comes alone, Bring thou a soul, and it shall save thine own."

And there was another lesson the brotherhood was trying to teach. The Church of England had yet to learn the enormous power she could wield if her laymen were brought out, so to speak, into rank and file, and acquired the art of co-operating and combining together to fight her battles and advance her cause, which was the evangelization of the nation. The Americans had discovered the secret of how to utilize their laymen and to set them to work on definite lines of true Churchmanship, and this was a result, that of all the religious activities in the United States, the Episcopal Church was the most active, and of all the activities in the Episcopal Church, the B. S. A. was foremost. What was accomplished by the Americans could assuredly be accomplished by English Churchmen. But the exercise of patience and perseverance was necessary. Of course it was not expected that every clergyman could at once accept the notion that the aid of the laity was an absolute necessity to win the men of England to recognize that public worship was a duty. Difficulties of all kinds had to be encountered when introducing any new suggestion. The Archbishop of Ontario was one of the two surviving bishops who were present at each of the four Lambeth Conferences, and his description of the way in which the four conferences had been received was amusing. The first, he said, had been treated with consternation; the second, with toleration; the third, with approbation, and the fourth, with acclamation. In bringing the B. S. A. before the notice of the clergy, his own experience was somewhat on the same lines. The first interview would create in some minds a sensation of "consternation" at the mere proposal of the idea, on the next occasion, it would be that of "toleration;" on the third, it would be of "approbation," and on the fourth, of "acclamation."

Mr. E. D. Onions, Edgebaston, bore testimony that his chapter's results were in deepening the spiritual life of the men, and that their Bible study and meetings for prayer had been to them a blessing. There was in his parish a men's afternoon Sunday service, and they were considering whether they could not undertake the beating up of men for such gatherings and in connection with their two rules of effort and service. Their monthly corporate Communion services were well attended, and altogether they were persevering in their work.

Mr. F. Firth, Armley, Leeds, remarked that in his parish there were plenty of organizations, but there were no corresponding results. If he thought that the B. S. A. would be acceptable to his vicar, he would suggest that it might take the place of several of them.

Mr. G. Lucas, Hitchin, said they wanted to reach men who were now out of their reach. He was glad to hear of this movement, not only for laboring men, but for the middle and upper classes. They wanted some definite plan by which they could help their brothers to lead better lives. He would see what his clergyman would say on the subject.

The chairman, the Rev. J. O. Murray, fellow and dean of Emmanuel College, Cambridge, remarked that the Archbishop of Canterbury used to impress upon the clergy and laity of his diocese that it was their business to make those who were not Christians, Christians, and those who were Christians, better Christians. There was this fundamental difference between this society and other guilds; viz., that the latter existed for their own good, whilst the principle of the B. S. A. was that of giving, not getting. The man who was doing spiritual work learned, as he never learned before, his need of spiritual grace, and gained a tremendous development of spiritual life.

An "Exclamation" of St. Theresa

TRANSLATED FROM THE ORIGINAL SPANISH BY ANNA F. RUTH

"O MY Hope and my Father, and my Creator; yea, my true Lord and Brother! When I consider how Thou hast said that Thy 'delights are with the sons of men,' much is my soul rejoiced. O Lord of heaven and earth, what words are these not to dishearten any sinner. Does there fail Thee, Lord, peradventure, some one with whom to delight Thyself, that Thou seekest such a worm as I? That voice which was heard at the Baptism, that saith that Thou delightest Thyself in Thy Son—are we then to be all equal, Lord? O the great mercy and favor, so far beyond our possibility of deserving? And all this do we forget, we that die? Bethink Thee, O my God, of so great a misery, and look upon our weakness, since Thou dost know all things.

O my soul, consider the great delight and the great love which the Father hath in knowing

His Son, and the Son in knowing His Father, and the burning love wherewith the Holy Spirit joins Himself to them; and how none of Them can withdraw from this love and knowledge, because They are One. These Divine Persons know one another, These love one another, and each delighteth in the others.

What need is there then of my love? Wherefore dost Thou desire it, my God, or what dost Thou gain therein? Blessed be Thou, oh mayst Thou be blessed, my God, forever! Be glad, my soul that there is One who can love thy God as He ought to be loved. Be glad that there is One who knoweth His goodness and His worthiness. Give Him thanks, that He gave us upon the earth Him that knoweth Him even thus—His only Son. Under this shelter, my soul, thou canst go and beseech Him, since this Majesty delighteth Himself with thee, that all the things of earth are not sufficient to withdraw thee from delighting thyself and gladdening thyself in the greatness of thy God, and in how much He deserveth to be loved and praised, and that He may help thee so that thou mayst be one little reason more why His Name should be blessed, so that thou mayst say with truth: My soul doth praise and magnify the Lord.

Never Mind

BY EMMA PLAYTER SEABURY

Yes, life is a terrible struggle I know,
And toil is a terrible grind;
The very worst people have found it is so,
And the very best ones are resigned.
Never mind.

There are always some people most horribly mean,
Malicious, backbiting, unkind;
The wicked will flourish like bay trees, I've seen,
And the honest ones seem undermined.
Never mind.

Your neighbor rolls by in his coach every day,
You walk in the rain and the wind;
His children to Europe go sailing away,
While yours to work are assigned.
Never mind.

Your heart should be light if your conscience is right,
And you never have whimpered or whined.
There is always a path leading out to the light,
And the path you are certain to find,
If you mind.

Have courage! there's nothing can happen by chance,
Though all of the ills be combined;
Keep a stiff upper lip, don't recede, but advance,
The gold is much better refined.
Do you mind?

And do not forget that the flings that are cast,
Rebound to the soul that designed;
But the truthful and honest will get there at last,
Although they seem going it blind.
Never mind.

The mills of the gods grind exceedingly small;
You have lost, but you have not repined;
And worry is worse than the work, after all,
And grief is with hope interlined,
If you mind.

Your sorrows have crushed, but you've lifted your head,
And the purpose of life have divined;
You were brave where another has faltered instead,
And your spirit has never repined.
Never mind.

AN article in the editorial department two weeks ago, headed "At His Best," which was attributed to the Bishop of West Virginia, should have been credited to the Rev. A. W. Snyder. It was printed years ago, and afterwards reprinted as one of the tracts of THE LIVING CHURCH series. It was good enough to have been copied time and again, and to be repeated in our own columns. It was only by inadvertence that an erroneous credit was given.

WHEN you see a large and conspicuous thermometer hung outside the drug store, you need not infer that the proprietor is a peculiarly public-spirited citizen, and that, regardless of expense, he is determined that the sweltering population shall be able to know exactly how hot it is. Of course he may be, but the more natural inference when the mercury is among the nineties, would be that he had for sale behind the thermometer cooling drinks of appetizing flavor. Appearances may be deceptive, but facts remain certain. There is nothing so conducive to an overpowering thirst as the vision of the mercury firmly marking ninety degrees, unless it be the sight of the same marking ninety-five degrees.

AMONG some "good stories" gathered by a correspondent of the Daily News in an interview with Mr. Augustus C. Hare, are the following: "I was told the other day," said Mr. Hare, "of a school child who, on being asked to illustrate a certain hymn, came up with a little sketch representing a woman carefully nursing a little bear, under which were written the lines:

Can a woman's tender care
Cease towards the child she-bear?"

Mr. Hare's friend capped this story with the answer of some school boy who deserves knighthood, surely: "A lie is an abomination unto the Lord, but a very present help in time of trouble."

Pen-and-Ink-lings

"DECLINED with thanks" is sometimes a boomerang to the editor. The New York Times tells how Robert Louis Stevenson had his revenge on the editor of a well-known magazine to whom he applied for the privilege of writing something. "The editor eyed him dispassionately, and told him that his stuff would hardly do. Nine years passed. In the meantime, the 'stuff' had been disposed of elsewhere, and the literary journals were filled with notes about the new author. In the full blaze of his fame he paid another visit to America. Among the first to leave cards at Mr. Stevenson's hotel was the aforesaid editor of the aforesaid magazine. Mr. Stevenson had a very retentive memory. He rolled a cigarette and repeated the incident. 'How provoking,' said the editor. 'I wonder which of my clerks could have been so discourteous to you.' Stevenson lighted his cigarette, and replied mildly, and with his usual beautiful smile: 'Why, now I recall his face. You are the man I saw.'"

MY wild ducks have vanished, perhaps have joined the eagles in happier hunting grounds. There were four of them that had made their home and nests around the Point; one was a mother with seven chicks. She came very near to our cottage frequently, and learned almost to trust us. Our own chickens were growing jealous of them, for the scraps we left on the beach for the wild fledgelings were subtracted from the rations allotted to the domestic brood. We made it all right, however, and silenced all chirping complaints, by adding a few handfuls of corn to the food for home consumption. The wild fowl, accustomed only to soft food, do not keep their grinding apparatus in order for hard grain.

But our environment is too "civilized" for the evolution of defenceless ducks. The mother had carried the most of her brood through the ordinary perils with which wild nature abounds, had fought her way along the shore with hawks and crows, and had gleaned a scanty fare from the barren beach and shallow water, till her ducklings were strong enough to swim a little. Then she took them foraging afar, sometimes carrying them on her back, when they were tired, as they always were when she came home; and it was very interesting to watch the little family through the glass as they came sailing into the haven where they would be, all huddled in a bunch, the head of the old duck rising with watchful eyes from amidst the group. When she was weary of the burden, she would rise and flap

A LITTLE boy who, in the course of some conversation of his elders, heard a good deal of talk about the progress of civilization, approached his grandfather who was taking no part in the talk.

"Grandpapa," said the child, "what is the difference between civilization and barbarism?" "Barbarism, my boy," answered the old man, "is killing your enemy with a hatchet at a distance of a step, and civilization is killing him with a bomb-shell twelve miles away!"—Youth's Companion.

ONE of our clerical friends sends us the following: "As I was sitting this afternoon in my study, down the street came a ragman with his wagon and its bony horse, and as he came he made the air to vibrate with his raucous cries. To him an urchin on the sidewalk called: 'What did you give your wife for dinner?' and loud the antiphon resounded still, 'Rags, old iron,' and I turned aside and wept, considering how much the small boy of this generation surpassed in wickedness his predecessors."

REFINEMENT of mind and delicacy of expression are things to be desired in a public speaker, but it is barely possible that these were carried to an unnecessary extreme by the Kansas City preacher who, in discoursing on the miracles of the Old Testament, respected the modesty of his her wings, and scatter the young ones in every direction; and they would splash around and protest that they couldn't swim another inch, and sneak up and catch hold of the maternal feathers and settle down for another nice sail.

That is the way the family was faring, when a boy with a boat pursued them, "just for fun," not meaning to kill them, I trust, but excited with the sport, and unmindful of the terror and suffering which he was inflicting. He drove them up and down the bay, keeping near enough to give them no rest. Frantic with fear, the little ones fluttered over the water till they were exhausted, then the mother took them on her back and made desperate efforts to escape the pursuer. But she could not shake him off. Her little ones are failing and falling behind. She turns with impotent fury upon the boy and the boat, dashing through the water with head erect and flashing wings, but sees that resistance is hopeless. So the little tragedy went on in sight of our door, until we could stand it no longer. Some of the family were in tears when I came upon the scene, having watched it for a long time. "Let those ducks alone!" I shouted; and he let them alone. We saw them but once after that. The mother had but four little ones.

The reflections suggested by this incident are too numerous and weighty for discussion in these summer notes, but I cannot forbear offering a few words of expostulation to the man with a gun and the boy with a boat. Sympathy for human suffering, tenderness towards our human kind, have marvelously developed under the influences of Christian civilization. These were exceptional qualities of character, possessed by few, before the Gospel of Christ had touched the heart of the world. Kindness to domestic animals has grown up under the shadow of this love of God and man, but for wild birds and beasts the angel of pity so far seems to plead in vain. "Sympathy extending beyond the limit of humanity," says Dr. Munthe, "is one of the latest moral qualities acquired by mankind." Cruelty to wild animals, and indifference to their sufferings, characterizes the most enlightened and progressive civilization that the world has ever known. The ruthless destruction of buffalo and other harmless game would be a reproach to a race of savages. The slaughter of birds to decorate the hats of Christian women is a sin and shame. Boy or man—it is all the same—"let us kill something!" But they do not always kill when they shoot. They often maim and torture. It is but a short step from this to vivisection with its indescribable horrors.

I am not declaiming against the taking of animal life for a useful purpose, in a legitimate way, but against the indiscriminate slaughter and torture of God's creatures. Let the ducks alone, my boy, when they can be of no use to you. Delight in their joy of living, in their exhibition of the tenderest traits of maternity, in their beauty of plumage and movement. You should have greater satisfaction in this than in killing them or drowning their ducklings. "Next to the joy of creation," says a writer in Contemporary Review, "must be that of sympathy with the thing created and with its pleasures." "Ah! my dear friend with a gun, when shall we learn

"Never to blend our pleasure or our pride
With sorrow of the meanest thing that feels."

Sam Jones at Chautauqua

TO the Republican-Register: Went to hear the "only" Sam Jones, a recent Sunday, at the Chautauqua. Sam is a drawing card, sure, and if to draw a crowd is the desideratum, his engagement was a howling success. Also, if the object of sermons is to raise a laugh, I think I never saw a congregation laugh and applaud more during a sermon. Jokes more or less refined, epithets hurled at all parties, professions, practices, who were stigmatized as mostly fools, rascals, liars, imposters, kept his hearers laughing, grinning, chuckling, for two hours. One could scarcely have enjoyed a circus more, nor is there a "Mr. Merryman" in a circus tent, striped, spotted, and adorned with fool's cap and bells, that could have amused us more.

Some things he said, too, were very comforting to us sinners. Now, we had been brought up to believe that God was angry when we went bad; that He loved good men and women a little better than he did rascals. But the Reverend Sam says no. He says, if anything, He loves sinners a little better than good men, as mothers love their bad boys best; that when sheep go astray, His love leaves the fold where the orderly sheep abide and follows and blesses the unruly ones with especial fervor. It is soothing to think, when this preacher sends so many of us bad Republicans, wicked Democrats, naughty business men, and hypocritical preachers to hell, that the Lord loves drunkards, thieves, saloon men, and murderers more than philanthropists, evangelists, and common striped moral men and women.

Yes, and the Lord evidently loves Sam Jones. Could such a sleek, self-satisfied, self-laudatory orator as he fail to win the Divine approval? He has two chances to one of ordinary preachers; if he is honest, he merits the Lord's blessing; if he's a hypocrite, playing the religious game for the boodle there is in it, then the Lord will love Sam all the better! Lucky Sam! It's "heads I win, tails you loose" with him, and in the meantime this reverend abuser of wealth and respectability carefully pockets his two or three hundred dollars per day of the mammon of righteousness, with no fear that his growing wealth will drag him to hell! "After the ball is over," after his sermon is done, and his laughing congregation is dispersed, it would bother one to remember any really valuable saying of his that was an equivalent for the big money he gets. It might come under the head of amusements, but is scarcely adapted to Sabbath day exercises. Yet all the world goes to hear Sam Jones, and will do so. Great is Sam—and great is humbug.

Book Reviews and Notices

Border Lines in the Field of Doubtful Practices. By H. Clay Trumbull. New York and Chicago: Fleming H. Revell Company. Price, 75 cts.

The subjects of this book are such as present more or less questioning to the minds of young people. The drink question, tobacco, speculation, the theatre, the dance; these are treated of from a one-sided view. Mr. Trumbull condemns them all without qualification. He says much that is true, but it seems to us that his opinions are rather narrow. We do not like the egoism that apparently influences his views, nor do we admire the spirit of absolute infallibility that seems to govern his statements. Yet there are many things in the book that are calculated to be effective for good in their influence over the young.

SOME STUDIES IN NATURE

"THE BEE PEOPLE," by Margaret Warner Morley, illustrated by the author, is a little book for little readers, describing the little busy bee and his ways and works. It is chatty and entertaining, even as to the small details of structure, and much information is pleasantly imparted. Pictures of bees and flowers are scattered over the pages and woven in with the text, in a pleasing way. [Chicago: A. C. McClurg & Co. Price, $1.25]

Parents and teachers should be, and doubtless are, looking for aids in their work of opening the eyes and hearts of the young to the beauties and wonders of the world around them. Publishers are doing their part in providing attractive books. Every season has its fruitage in this way, and brings something new and interesting in this field. The earlier this field can be explored, in a simple way, by the children, the more abiding and profitable will be the impressions. Nature will be more intensely interesting for a life-time, from the study of its life and forms and laws in childhood.

"THE FIRST BOOK OF BIRDS," by Olive Thorne Miller, makes the work of an expert available for young students, and is very charming, as we should expect from the reputation of the author. Of the many full-page illustrations, apparently photographs from life, some are exquisitely colored. Scientific ornithology is not the aim of the book, but some account of the life and habits of birds; "to arouse sympathy and interest in the living bird, neither as a target nor as a producer of eggs, but as a fellow-creature whose acquaintance it would be pleasant to make." [Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. Price, $1.]

"FIELD, FOREST, AND WAYSIDE FLOWERS" contains "untechnical studies for unlearned lovers of nature." The author, Maud Goings (E. M. Hardinge), we recognize as an entertaining friend who induced us, not long ago, to dwell more "With the Wild Flowers." The fortunate readers of her present work will join her "personally conducted party," starting out with crocus time, and going on through field and forest, through spring and summer and autumn, even into winter woods, where "Ever upon old Decay the greenest mosses cling." This is not a book for children, but for the mature, though unlearned, reader. The illustrations are drawn from life, and are excellent. [New York: The Baker & Taylor Company. Price, $1.50.]

"A GUIDE TO THE WILD FLOWERS," by Alice Lounsberry, adds the most important element of color to the entertaining and helpful description and drawings. There are sixty-four full-page colored plates, very finely executed, besides the one hundred drawings, by Mrs. Ellis Rowan. Dr. N. L. Britton, of Columbia University, director of the New York Botanical Garden, highly commends the work of both author and artist. Classification according to soil or conditions of growth, is a good feature. An index of classification by color is also given. The elements of botany which are needed for actual work in the field with this book, are given in "A Chapter to Study." The book will be a great treasure to flower students. [New York: Frederick A. Stokes Company. Price, $2.50.]

"PLANT RELATIONS," by John M. Coulter, Ph. D., a first book of botany, one of the "Twentieth Century Text Books," is rich in illustration and felicitous in treatment. Dr. Coulter is a high authority in the science of plant life, the head professor of botany in the University of Chicago. While the book is, of course, thoroughly scientific, up to date, it is not too difficult for the average student, and comprises a sufficient course in the hands of a competent teacher. The author well says: "As the overwhelming factor in successful teaching is the teacher, methods are of secondary importance, and may well vary." The best teacher will find such a text book as this a great help, and doubtless Dr. Coulter's "Suggestions to Teachers," in a separate pamphlet, will add to its value for use in the class room. [New York: D. Appleton & Co. Price, $1.10 net.]

New Music

An Evensong service, Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis, in G, by M. Agatha Bennett, organist of St. John's, Buffalo, has reached us. It is a carefully written and effective composition, bearing marks of a musicianly hand, with the happy absence of any over-straining after uncommon effects in a simple theme, or too much musical freshness. London: Charles Vincent. United States: Oliver Ditson Company. 4d.

Periodicals

The Scottish Review for July opens with a luminous article on "Early Struggles for the Indian Trade," showing how the British finally supplanted the Portuguese in that land of empire and riches. A very good paper on "Golf and its Literature" follows, but we are not led very far afield, and in referring to golf in America, the writer "fozels" too much, and does not "tee" his ball properly—in short, he makes some absurd allusions. There is an excellent paper on "Roundell, Earl of Selborne," by William O'Connor Morris, which gives a lively and appreciative sketch of the career of that eminent jurist. "The Story of Tusculum" is well told, and this brief history of that ancient town will delight the classical student. There are the usual Summary of Foreign Reviews and Notices of Contemporary Literature.

The Quarterly Review for July contains several articles of special interest to American readers; notably, "The Philippines and Their Future," and "The American Colonies in the Eighteenth Century." The latter article is a justification, or an attempted one, of the Tory ministry and King George III. in regard to their treatment of the colonies, and their course before and during the Revolutionary War. It is chiefly a caustic criticism of Sir G. O. Trevelyan's recent book on "The American Revolution." The article on "The Holy Sepulchre" is a summary of the historic vicissitudes of the chief shrine of Christendom, with the suggestion that it may yet again become the centre of warring nations. "Mrs. Oliphant's Autobiography" gives us an insight into the beautiful character of one of the most successful of modern novelists and authors.

THE ARCHBISHOPS' ADVICE.—By their action in the matter of the use of incense and lights in the processions in Anglican Churches, the Archbishops of Canterbury and York rather advise than authoritatively declare against the use of candles and incense, though lights are permitted on the altar. The moral effect of this decision, which does not amount to more than an executive order interpreting English canonical law, does not have the force of a canonical court decision, will be limited in part by the extreme Ritualists who would rather disobey it, and take chances of a further or final interpretation, than give up their practice of the sensuous and æsthetic in ritual on the instant. The only way in which the practice can be suppressed is by direct parliamentary legislation. This could finally settle the question, but it cannot be had; it will be recalled that the attempt to secure this failed last winter. Here, indeed, the Nonconformists join the Ritualists; they oppose parliamentary legislation because they think the use of "popish practices" will drive many in the Anglican Communion into Nonconformity, and will also hasten Disestablishment.

POLYGAMY IN UTAH.—For some time back strong assertions have been made by the religious papers and by the representatives of the Evangelical Churches in Utah, that notwithstanding the promises given at the time when it was recognized as a State, the practice of polygamy was being continued by the Mormons. On the other hand, it has been as strongly denied. The matter is now being brought to a square issue before the courts by the prosecution of Angus Cannon, one of the high officials of the Mormon Church, for a breach of the law against polygamy. The correspondent is a woman who has been prominent in politics, and served a term in the State Senate, when she voted for a strong anti-polygamous law. She is reputed to be Cannon's fourth wife, and recently gave birth to a daughter. This is being made a test case, and should it prove successful, other prosecutions will follow. Canada has an interest in this fight, as it is not improbable that the Mormons in Alberta will be largely influenced in their course by the success or otherwise of their co-religionists in Utah.

MISAPPLYING A DOCTRINE.—It is interesting to observe that an Eastern paper has taken up the work of reviving the Malthusian principle, and is asserting with much vigor that "population tends to increase faster than the means of subsistence." The exact value and significance of this rule have been so plainly illustrated in the century since Malthus elaborated it, that they can be stated in a few words. Where the means of subsistence are in excess of the existing population, the tendency is for population to increase the faster. Where the means of subsistence are only adequate to the existing population, the increase of population cannot be faster, because the excess of population will perish for lack of subsistence. This has been proved signally in more than one way during the century of which Malthus saw the beginning. America and Australia, having means of subsistence, with civilized industry for vast populations, have seen an immense growth of population. In Europe, when he wrote, population seemed to be at a standstill, because the means of subsistence were no more than enough for the existing population. But the principle worked out in a different way than its author supposed. For the great inventions and devices of the century multiplied the means of subsistence so as to permit a great increase of population in Europe, as well as in the unsettled portions of the globe.

The new book is notable, first, because giving another of Mr. Sheldon's striking and purposeful stories; and, second, because woven into the story are the author's own answers to the multitude of questions which have arisen in the discussion over his former books, such as, "Are these plans feasible?" "Have they been tried?" "What ought to be done in my special case?" etc.? Every Sheldon reader will therefore wish to read this story.

About Making Over Some Things

BY THE LATE REV. S. T. ALLEN

MY buggy is out of repair, and I took it to a mechanic with the idea that a few new spokes, some mended irons, a new dash, and a coat of paint would put it to rights; but close inspection shows that the spokes must have new hubs, the irons new wood attachments, and that even then the new paint will cover a very imperfect vehicle, the repair of which will be equal to the cost of a new one, while the value, compared with a new one, will be small.

This set me thinking about making over things, and reminded me that I had an overcoat last autumn, of fair material, but so imperfectly made that I could not wear it, so I took it to a tailor to be made over, and found that the cost of ripping and fitting and making would be about equal to the cost of a new one outright, and that when done, it would be an unsatisfactory affair.

The experience of my readers, on a little reflection, will furnish numerous illustrations of the kind, where the making over is more expensive than the making anew, and the product always greatly inferior.

As one thing leads to another, I got to thinking about the difficulty of making over some Christians, when they are cast in a defective mould and get "set." They come to Confirmation with imperfect instruction, and very vague convictions; and instead of remedying the defect by "following on," they stop at the beginning. As a consequence they develop all sorts of weakness of character and imperfection of Churchmanship; they are put in a false position, and out of harmony with the spirit and movement of the Church, and can never derive much benefit from their membership, or be anything but a drag on the parish, and a sore trial to their rector, until they are made over. But the making over costs more labor by far than the making anew, and then the product is less satisfactory!

There are some who start with very inadequate ideas of the sacraments of the Church, giving them low and loose interpretations, degrading the mysteries of religion with an infusion of rationalism, or limiting the power of God with a spirit of self-assertion; so they are out of harmony with their surroundings. Catholic teaching conflicts with their theories, the Prayer Book is full of "germs" of thought above the line of their vision, so they must revise the Prayer Book, and reform the Church, till there is positively no end to the changes they would make, and every change is a backward movement into the dark! Now we well know that it is not the Prayer Book that needs making over; it is not the Church that needs making over; but some of the people, like a misfitting garment, are made up wrong! They must be made over. But to "rip" and make over such work is a thankless business; it causes a world of trouble, as too many know to their sorrow; nor is that all; the repairs usually cost more than they come to. It is a fair question of debate whether it be not better to leave the old material for what it is worth, and look for new to make up into new and better work! It is a question which has already been started, whether the task before the Primitive Church of converting the pagan world, were as formidable as the task before the modern Church of making over the Christian world, so as to bring it into an assimilated and satisfactory condition.

One may test the matter, perhaps, on a small scale, in the parish. Looking over the communicant list, you will find, with a fair percentage of good and valuable material, a percentage that is quite otherwise; and it is this "otherwise" material that causes all the vexation and trouble in a parish. It is uninstructed, and therefore hard to please; or jealous, and therefore quarrelsome; or indifferent, and therefore inaccessible; or made up wrong, and therefore a misfit generally.

Now while it might seem a very ungracious thing to cast all this misfitting and unsatisfactory material aside, and supply its place with new, there can be little doubt about the economy of the thing.

In our industries, the repair-shops have their place and importance; but all the great establishments make new things—what if the Church should turn her thoughts less to patching and mending, and employ all her beautiful machinery on new work! Or to drop the figure, while using the utmost vigilance, to avoid introducing to our Communion persons inadequately prepared or out of harmony with the Church; what if she should spend less in trying to repair those who are found to be radically defective and impracticable, and spend more on new material which is far more hopeful? But what shall become of the defective? Just what becomes of other imperfect things; they work in somewhere, according to their value, or go to the auction shop, just as some Christians go elsewhere to be disposed of as a second-hand and cheaper article.

"WHERE THERE IS A WILL THERE IS A WAY"

BY J. B. C.

QUIET reigned in the little town of Ohrdruf one summer night, more than three hundred years ago, for in every household all had gone to bed at dark, in order that they might be ready to commence the next day's work at daybreak. They had no electric lights and no gas-jets in those days to ruin their eyes; lamps were a luxury of the very wealthy, and candles an extravagance-reserved for long winter evenings, and not to be thought of in the lingering twilight of midsummer. Therefore, everybody went to bed early, and when the moon lifted her full, round face over the hills, and peered in at the various windows, she found little to interest her, until she came to the house of Christoph Bach, the village cantor. As the first moonbeam entered the window, a young boy who had been lying there wide awake, waiting for the moon to rise, sprang quietly out of bed, and began to make his way noiselessly down the steep stairs that led to the rooms on the lower floor. Pausing often to listen, and frightened more than once by the creaking of a board, or by some fancied sound that seemed to him loud enough to waken the soundest sleepers, he reached the great living-room at last, and made his way softly to the huge carved press at one side of the chimney. This "press," or cupboard, was a marvel of elaborate carving, the doors being wrought in an open-work pattern of vines and scrolls, like those in many old German houses to this day. Little Sebastian slipped his hand without difficulty through one of the openings, and began to grope for something within the carefully locked doors. At last his hand lighted on some manuscript music. This he rolled as closely as he could with one hand, and, passing it through one of the larger carved openings of the door, sped swiftly upstairs with his treasure, and regained his room in safety! Once there, he spread the music on the floor by the window, and, lying at full length on his stomach, proceeded to copy the notes of the organ music on some roughly ruled staves he had prepared beforehand—the moon looking on benignly, and “aiding and abetting” him with all her power.

But the time came, all too soon, when she could no longer shed the light of her countenance upon him, but must pass on, in her course, to other scenes. As the little room grew darker and darker, Sebastian was forced reluctantly to give up his work. Stealing down stairs again, he restored the manuscript to its place in the same manner as he had taken it out, and returned to his room to sleep the sleep of a healthy, happy, and very tired boy, his last thought being of exultation at having outwitted his jealous elder brother.

Sebastian had lived with his brother, Christoph, ever since the death of his father, some years before. Christoph was kind to the lad in the main, but the extraordinary talent of the boy made him anxious for his own reputation as a musician, and roused a demon of jealousy in his bosom. Only that very morning he had roughly and angrily forbidden Sebastian to copy, or even to look at, some rare old organ music he was desirous of learning, and throwing the precious volume into the cupboard, had locked the door and put the key in his pocket. But he did not make sufficient allowance for his little brother's ingenuity and strength of will. Not once only, but many times, did the moon lend her light to the young copyist, for every bright night through all the long summer found him sprawled on the floor, writing for dear life while his celestial lamp still shone, and only resigning himself to slumber when he could no longer see.

At last his long task was finished, and he had a complete copy as a reward of his patience and perseverance. But, alas and alas! Just about this time Christoph discovered what he was pleased to term the theft of the music, and, in anger, burned, not only the poor copy that had cost so much labor and self-denial, but the original as well, that he might never be able to repeat his offence. Sebastian shed bitter tears of disappointment and resentment, and never quite forgave his unkind brother, from whom he was soon afterward parted.

But no rebuffs could check the develop-

Harnessing the Nile

A TREMENDOUS task is to be undertaken by the English in Egypt—nothing less than the creation, for purposes of irrigation, of a reservoir having two or three times the superficial area of Lake Geneva. Ex-Consul-General F. C. Penfield describes the proposed undertaking in the February Century, in an illustrated article appropriately entitled, “Harnessing the Nile.” He says:

“Engineering skill is to rearrange nature's surface on the Egyptian frontier, and pond back into Nubia a body of water a hundred and forty miles long, crossing the tropic of Cancer, and extending southward nearly to Korosko—a goodly step on the journey to Abu-Simbel and Wady-Halfa—by means of a great dam across the Nile at Assuan. The Pyramids and the Sphinx have borne testimony through the centuries to the grandeur and power of execution which dwelt within the Nile valley, and what more fitting now than that the same valley be the theatre of a gigantic engineering exploit, audacious, perhaps, but certain of success, and ministering to man's necessities, rather than to his vanity?”

“As a building achievement, the scheme is on a scale worthy of a Ramesses or a Pharaoh. To create in the heart of the African desert a lake having from two to three times the superficial area of Lake Geneva in Switzerland, and control it with scientific precision, so that the impounded flood may be turned into distant channels at will, is a stupendous undertaking. But the engineers claim that their plans can be carried out to the letter; they have estimated the exact cost of the dam, computed almost to the gallon the volume of water that will be imprisoned, add figured the necessary resistance to be provided at every point of the masonry. In Cairo, the experts of the ministries of public works and finance, likewise, have calculated to a nicety the sum from taxation that will come into the public treasury through the country's augmented productiveness.

“Subordinate to the great dam, a smaller one, not unlike the barrage at the apex of the delta, ten miles to the north of Cairo, is to be made at Assiut. Its function will be to give a sufficient head to the river to force the water into the system of irrigation canals that vein hundreds of thousands of acres between Assiut and Cairo. The completion of the Cairo barrage (it was begun by Mehemet Ali Pasha, from the plans of a French engineer, but not made effective until England took the country in hand) so developed cotton culture as to add to the public revenue of the country at least $10,000,000 annually. It may safely be concluded that the Assuan reservoir is but one of a series which will in time be constructed southward to the Victoria Nyanza. The re-establishment of khedival authority at Khartum will determine this.”

Tree Murder in America

AT a recent public banquet one of the officers of one of our largest States slighted the efforts that have been made for the preservation of our woods by placing as first in importance the development of wood pulp and other industries in the threatened districts. To give a passing wage to a passing population he would destroy forests that, intelligently protected, would furnish work and wages for centuries.

Americans are the most wasteful of people. They have a big and fertile country, and they act as though it were impossible to exhaust its resources. But the immense increase in its growth, the constant enlargement of industries that require the destruction of natural material, must bring us to a pause. Natural gas was burned without stint just after its discovery, with the result that only enough remains for three years. We are told that the anthracite supply in this country cannot last much more than a hundred years longer. Already some of the prairie lands that were believed to be inexhaustible, requiring but one plowing a year to keep them fertile, are tired out, and demand to be fed. And most astonishing of our wastes is that of our woods, in which rests one of our best sources of wealth, and on which we rely for water. Whether we use timber for houses and ships or not, we must drink, and in chopping off our forests we are reducing our springs: ergo, our brooks, rivers and ponds: ergo, the fertility of the land: ergo, the population thereof.

It has been explained again and again, yet seems ever to acquire new emphasis, that the trees act as umbrellas to protect the fallen rain from quick evaporation, and give time to them to soak into the soil; also, that they create, with their fallen leaves and decayed branches, the vegetable mold in which succeeding forms of plant life find their nutriment. Strip a hill of its timber, and the rain runs swiftly down, causing a freshet in the river at its foot, because there is nothing to stay it. Worse still, it carries more or less soil with it, so that in a little time the hill is bared to its rocky frame. The mischief is that it requires years and years to repair a damage that a party of woodmen can inflict in a day.

This cutting is deplorable. It implies not merely the destruction of beauty, which is cause enough for lamentation, but hardship, especially in the country districts; it implies a lessening number of birds, our bright, tuneful, useful little friends, because they cannot secure nesting places; it implies a check on the fertility of the surrounding country; it implies disastrous floods in spring, when the snows melt, there being no soil to hold the moisture, and no screen of limbs or leaves to shadow the drifts from the northing sun; it implies a lessening rainfall, with increasing drought; it implies the ultimate conversion of deforested tracts into deserts.

The case of Spain is a familiar one. It was once well wooded and was capable of sustaining a large agricultural population. Its trees were relentlessly hewn down by greedy despoilers, with the result that, in time, districts once fertile became rainless and dusty, the vegetable mold disappeared, the streams dwindled, and the population was driven from the soil into the cities, where many became beggars, adventurers, or laborers, at uncongenial tasks at wretched wages. To this day the arid districts remain as nature's protest against man's destructiveness and selfishness.

There is a remedy for this and it is time it was applied. It consists in scientific forestry. It is not necessary to restrict the cutting of timber to a great extent. It needs only a little intelligence and a little after-work in planting. A hill should never be deforested. The largest and oldest trees should be chosen for cutting. In place of every one cut down a sapling should be planted. In many of the tracts devastated within recent years, thousands and hundreds of thousands of trees have been destroyed and not a single one set out to replace them. Yet we have officials who can defend such proceedings! It is appalling.

In the parts of the Old World that claim to be enlightened the authorities have been compelled to institute reforms, for there was a general alarm over the drying of the springs and the failure of the rivers. The Rhine, the Rhone, the Elbe, the Danube—in fact, most of the important rivers of Europe have subsided by several feet, and not only the navigation, but the health, convenience, and industries of the people have been correspondingly affected. To stay this devastation, to restore, if possible, fatness to the soil and depth to the streams, boards have been created to guard the forests, prevent needless destruction by chopping and by fire—our forests have suffered much from the carelessness of hunters and miners in leaving fires burning in the woods—to study the effects of soil, climate, and locality, and to plant liberally. Through the beneficent operations of the forestry boards, districts have been redeemed, industries have been preserved and restored, and the beauty and prosperity of several lands favorably affected. We, who have more natural advantages, must be less wasteful or we shall not have them long.—Saturday Evening Post.

Dressing Parisian Dogs

THERE seem to be some 5,000 or 6,000 persons in Paris who are determined to make the canine race go to the dogs as speedily as unreasonable pampering can send them there. This number of so-called lovers of dogs is, according to an article in Good Words, inscribed on the books of the Parisian dog-tailors. One of the tailors took the writer of the article in his confidence, saying:

"For the most part our clients belong to the higher classes of society—people who can afford to pay high prices and who pay ready cash. The business is, therefore, a very profitable one, because the materials used do not cost very much, and we sell them at a large profit. For instance, I recently had a very remunerative order from the daughter of a diplomat in Paris. She was about to be married, and I made a set of gala clothes for her dogs to match the liveries of the lackeys in her father's house-

NO FAITH CURE

ABOUT STUART'S DYSPEPSIA TABLETS.

They Cure Stomach Trouble and Indigestion Anyway, Whether You Have Faith in Them or Not.

All physicians agree that the element of faith has a great deal to do in the cure of disease.

Firm belief and confidence in a family physician or the same confidence and faith in a patent medicine, have produced remarkable cures in all ages.

This is especially true in nervous troubles, and no field offers so prolific a harvest for the quack and charlatan as the diseases arising from a weak or run down nervous system.

Nevertheless, the most common of all diseases, indigestion and stomach troubles, which in turn cause nervous diseases, heart troubles, consumption, and loss of flesh, requires something besides faith to cure.

Mere faith will not digest your food for you, will not give you an appetite, will not increase your flesh and strengthen your nerves and heart; but Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets will do these things, because they are composed of the elements of digestion, they contain the juices, acids, and peptones necessary to the digestion and assimilation of all wholesome food.

Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets will digest food if placed in a jar or bottle in water heated to 98 degrees, and they will do it much more effectively when taken into the stomach after meals, whether you have faith that they will or not.

They invigorate the stomach, make pure blood and strong nerves in the only way that nature can do it, and that is from plenty of wholesome food, well digested. It is not what we eat, but what we digest, that does us good.

Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets are sold by druggists at 50 cents for full-sized package.

Little book on cause and cure of stomach troubles mailed free by addressing F. A. Stuart Co., Marshall, Mich.

hold. As the bride entered the residence after the ceremony, her three dogs were awaiting her at the top of the grand staircase dressed in these costumes with bouquets of orange blossoms attached to their collars, and held in a silken leash by one of the footmen. The effect was marvelous! Then, again, the daughter of a rich banker, recently married, had another idea. I made, to measure, for each of her dogs—she had half a dozen—regular bridesmaids' costumes of white faille embroidered with lace and garlanded with orange blossoms, while on their feet they wore small slippers of white satin, also specially made to measure!"

One does not quite know whether pity for the dogs thus tortured, or contempt for the owners who bend their minds to such doings, is the predominant feeling aroused these facts.

The waterproof for rainy days, the dust cloak for journeys, the mantle for cold weather, and the gray linen suit for seaside wear are all articles with which a French society dog has long become familiar. But this year, Mr. Waller tells us, the poor creatures' owners "have gone one step further in rendering the sublime handiwork of the Creator ridiculous by providing their pets with sets of fine linen. No society dog which really respects itself would think of possessing less than a dozen of undergarments of lawn, if it be in good health, or of silk or surah if it should be subject to colds or nervous complaints! Then if the 'poor darling' should be troubled with watery eyes, a dozen embroidered cambric handkerchiefs become an absolute necessity. And this is not all. His delicate little feet must be kept dry by boots made to measure, of leather or India-rubber, to suit his particular temperament." This, together with bracelets and tie-pins, with perfumes and fancy soaps, with ivory combs and brushes, and a good many other things, make up the dog's toilet necessities, and if the Parisian pet dog could speak, she would certainly explain that her "friends" lead her the life of a dog, in the worst interpretation of that saying.—Westminster Gazette.

MRS. GEN. WATERMAN, my mother, says a writer in the New York Sun, was not long married, in Binghamton, when her father, Gen. Joshua Whitney who named and founded the town, called, with a few other gentlemen of the then small village, a new minister to take the place of the Presbyterian clergyman lately dismissed by the congregation, not for fault of conduct, but because his sermons were thought tiresome. According to custom, Mr. Niles, the new minister, on his arrival began his round of visits to the women of his congregation to inquire into the state of their souls, and to take a cup of tea with them for sociability and better acquaintance. Mr. Niles was a tall, thin man, and what fortune-tellers would call "dark complected." He wore a rueful countenance becoming his calling, and never forgot the vocation of bringing terror into the hearts of his people for conscience sake.

My mother was of the best type of intellectual and high-toned American women. Though young, she had been well educated for her years, and she had inherited the strong points of her father's character.

Mr. Niles "was master of the situation" in the village of Binghamton, for as yet Presbyterians were the only acknowledged sect in the place. One of his first calls was upon the daughter of Gen. Whitney.

With all sincerity, Mrs. Waterman received the pastor, and he soon made known his business. "Well, Mrs. Waterman, I hope you are in a state of grace," he said, in a solemn tone.

"I hope, Mr. Niles, I am not without it," she answered, smiling.

Then followed what she thought was rather an unjustifiable search into her conscience, for a pastor of the Protestant faith, and she answered, as was her nature, without any hesitation or concealment, what was in her heart respecting God and salvation and her own duties. He looked astonished at her bold assertions, and, with half-closed eyes, inquired:

"Mrs. Waterman, are you willing, perfectly willing, to be damned?"

"Oh, Mr. Niles," she exclaimed, "what a question! No, I am not willing to be damned."

"Mrs. Waterman, if it be God's will, are you willing to be damned?"

"No, I am not."

"Then you are not in our faith; you are not a Presbyterian."

"No, I am not," she answered with spirit. Mr. Niles left abruptly, much disgusted.

Mrs. Waterman went to her father in trouble and repeated the conversation.

"Pamela, what creed do you prefer?" asked Gen. Whitney.

"I like the Episcopal Church best, father," she answered.

"You shall be gratified, my daughter. I shall give the ground and we will build a church. Meantime, I shall send for an Episcopal minister and pay his salary."

The city of Binghamton now enjoys six or seven Protestant churches and one large Roman Catholic church. It owes its possession of the first Episcopal minister to the fact that Mrs. Gen. Waterman was not willing to be damned!

GRAPE-NUTS.

A New and Highly Nutritious Food.

The odd-sounding name is used to designate a peculiar food, made not exactly in the shape of nuts, but having a pleasant, nutty flavor, and crisp brittleness that makes them a charming favorite with the palate.

Of yet more value than the taste is the food value of Grape-Nuts. They are largely composed of grape-sugar (your dictionary can tell you about that), and those who use them will find the morning meal has not only been pleasant, but has been quickly and easily digested; for grape-sugar is an article produced in the human body at one stage of the digestion of food, and is at once ready for transformation into good, healthy blood and nourishment.

It should not be understood that the grape-sugar of which Grape-Nuts is made has been produced in the human body. But this grape-sugar is made by much the same process as the body employs, and is produced by natural treatment of grains without any foreign substance whatever. It is made by the Postum Co., at Battle Creek, Mich. The result is perhaps the most highly nutritious food ever produced.

Grocers keep Grape-Nuts.

Children's Hour

Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations,
That is known as the Children's hour.

Time Enough

Two little squirrels out in the sun,
One gathered nuts, the other had none;
"Time enough yet," his constant refrain,
"Summer is only just on the wane."

Listen, my child, while I tell you his fate:
He roused him at last, but he roused him too late.
Down fell the snow from the pitiless cloud
And gave little squirrel a spotless white shroud.

Two little boys in a schoolroom were placed,
One always perfect, the other disgraced;
"Time enough yet for my learning," he said;
"I'll climb by and by from the foot to the head."

Listen, my darling: Their looks have turned gray,
One as a governor is sitting to-day;
The other, a pauper, looks out at the door
Of the almshouse, and idles his days as of yore.

Two kinds of people we meet every day:
One is at work, the other at play—
Living uncared for, dying unknown—
The busiest hive hath ever a drone.

Tell me, my child, if the squirrels have taught
The lesson I long to impart in your thought:
Answer me this, and my story is done,
Which of the two would you be, little one?

For Our Boys

WHEN I was a boy, just about your age, we lived in a little new England village, which was five miles from the city.
Now, one of the greatest pleasures of my life then was to go with father to the city, and see all those sights which are always new and wonderful to the country boy and girl.

One of my daily duties in the summer was to drive the cows to the pasture, about half a mile from the barn each morning, and get them again at evening. Not very far from the pasture bars lived my uncle's family, and when I tell you that he had two boys just about my age, you boys will know what fun we used to have, and how much I liked to stop and play with them. Very many times when I was sent to the pasture, and told to come right home after driving the cows, I would go around by way of uncle's house, just intending to say good morning to my cousins, and then return home. But alas for a boy's good intentions! I would get interested in something the boys had to show me and then get to playing, and the first thing I knew, it would be noon, and I was again a bad boy who had not obeyed my parents about coming home. I am sorry to say this happened a good many times, and the only excuse I could offer to my parents was that I got so busy playing that I forgot what they told me about coming home.

I remember one bright morning early in September, when I was cautioned to return from the pasture as quickly as possible, as father wanted me. I can see the long lane with its low stone walls on each side, and its top-riders of long poles with the cross stakes to hold them; and in spots along the wall, the clusters of raspberry bushes, hanging full of ripe, luscious fruit; and then here and there the patches of running blackberries, and you boys know that these berries are not bad for a boy's stomach.

Well, I was not very swift getting the cows to the pasture that morning, and they had many a good nibble at the green grass that grew so profusely near the foot of the walls. When the cows were in the pasture and the bars put up carefully so that "Old Fan" could not take them down with her horns—as she was sure to do if they were not driven in tight—I looked across the field and saw my cousins having a nice time jumping from the great beams of the barn into a load of hay which stood in the floor.

I could not resist the temptation to run over and have "just one jump" before going home, but promised myself that I would only just stop a minute, and then run all the way home to make up for lost time. But, boys, let me tell you that it is a good deal easier to stay away from temptation, whether it be play when you should work, or whether it be doing bad when you should be doing good. I took one jump, and the delight of feeling the wind in my face, and the swift, dizzy fall through the air, and then the sinking into the sweet, new-made hay, and then the bound that was made as the hay sprung back into place—boys, it was too much for my weak resolution to go straight home after the one jump. I stayed and jumped, and made camps in the hay, and played Indian, and did many, many such things as boys always do when they are playing together and having a good time on an old New England farm.

It was long after noon before I thought about going home, and then you can imagine how bad I felt. I went slowly home, resolving that I would never again disobey my parents, but would always do just as they told me.

I was a very humble, penitent boy, I assure you, as I went with downcast eyes into the big kitchen where my mother was busy at her work. And what do you suppose I learned from her? Why, that father had taken the team and my sister, and, after waiting in vain an hour or two for me had gone to the city on business. A whole day in the city lost because of giving up to a foolish desire to jump on the hay, when I had the hay in the barn and could jump every day in the year if I wanted to!

I have no doubt you city boys think that you would gladly give up several days in the city for one on the farm, but you would not think that way if you were country boys and only saw the city once in a great while.

It would be useless to undertake to tell you how bad I felt, and how long the day was—that same bright, September day, boys, that had only lasted, it seemed to me, a few minutes in the forenoon—until father and sister got home.

As I heard from sister's lips of the enjoyments of that day, how they saw sights which are every day seen by you boys, but which seemed to me to be as wonderful as the scenes in the "Arabian Nights," I made a promise to myself, which I afterwards kept pretty faithfully, that I would be more obedient to my parents. That was years ago, but I never think of that day without

A True Modifier

Cow's milk is not constituted like mother's milk, and for infant feeding contains too much casein (cheese) and not enough carbohydrates (milk sugar), therefore it needs modification. This is what Mellin's Food is for, to modify milk.
Mellin's Food is a true modifier; it prevents the casein from becoming a solid mass in the stomach thereby inducing colic; it furnishes carbohydrates and phosphatic salts, and makes milk like mother's milk.

wishing that I had gone directly home from the pasture.

And now, boys, for the moral, for all good stories like this have a moral, you know.

Our Heavenly Father waits and waits for us to do the things which He planned for our enjoyment, and by and by we learn that if we had done as He tells us to do, we would have had much greater pleasure than we had in doing the things which He had asked us not to do. He knows what is best for us, and we ought to trust Him just the same as we trust our earthly parents when they plan and work for our happiness.—St. Mark's Rubric.

Apples of Gold

A YOUNG girl was passing her aged great aunt one day, writes Kate Upson Clark, in The Congregationalist, when she suddenly stopped, laid her hand gently on the white head beside her, and said: "How pretty and curly your hair is, Aunt Mary. I wish I had such pretty hair!"

The simple words brought a quick flush of pleasure to the wrinkled face, and there was a joyous quiver in the brief acknowledgment of the spontaneous little courtesy.

Few of us realize the dearth of such attentions which the old suffer. Many of them have been persons of consequence in their prime. As illness and sorrow gradually weaken their spirits, they retire into the background. They are no longer pursued by the honeyed words which interest or affection once heaped upon them. Too often they linger on in more or less cheerless obscurity until they die.

"I was astonished to find what an interesting person that old lady is who lives at Mrs. D.'s," remarked one lady to another. She seems to be an aunt, or great aunt to Mr. D., but she has always sat back in a corner when I have been there, and I never supposed that she knew anything in particular. Yesterday Mrs. D. appealed to her several times. It seemed to draw her out. She is remarkably intelligent and has had wonderful experiences of life."

"Did you think to tell her how much you had enjoyed talking with her?"

"No, that never occurred to me."

The knowledge that her words and personality had so favorably impressed her visitor might have given the quiet old lady a pleasure which would lighten many weary hours. "There is no tonic like happiness."

A young man said to his mother: "You ought to have seen Aunt Esther to-day when I remarked casually, 'What a pretty gown you have on to day, and how nice you look in it.' She almost cried, she was so pleased. I hadn't thought before that such a little thing as that would be likely to please her."

"I never expect to eat any cookies so good as those you make, mother," said a bearded man one day, and he was shocked when he saw her evident delight in his words, for he remembered that he had not thought to speak before for years of any of the thousand comforts and pleasures with which her skill and love had filled his boyhood.

"He's A Little Feller"

DOWN in Frankfort Street the other cold day, I found a newsboy seated on a grating in the sidewalk, up through which came a little warmth from the basement below. He had something beside him covered up with a ragged and dirty old handkerchief, and as I sat down alongside, he cautioned: "Look out now, and don't hurt him."

"What is it?"

He lifted the handkerchief with the greatest care, and there, on one of the iron bars, all huddled up and half frozen, was a brown sparrow.

"Where did you get him?"

"In the street, out there. Got so cold he was tucked."

"And what will you do with him?"

"Get him good and warm, and let him go. He's a little feller, and orter have a fair show."

I added my efforts to Jack's, and after a few minutes the bird began moving about in a lively manner, and giving vent to his satisfaction by a series of chirps. Jack lifted him up, and gave him a toss in the air, and away he sailed for his nest under a high cornice.

"Boys can get along 'most anyhow," said Jack, as he shivered in the cold sweeping wind from the river, "but birds is such little fellers that we've got to sort o' boost 'em now and then. He's all right, and we're all right, and good-bye to you."

RIVERVIEW MILITARY ACADEMY

Riverview Military Academy, illustrations of which appear elsewhere in this issue, was organized and established in 1886, on College Hill, Poughkeepsie, N. Y., and was known as the Poughkeepsie Collegiate School until 1867, when by change of location to Riverview, it became the Riverview Military Academy. Poughkeepsie is fitly termed a "city of schools," and possesses, among other features, an excellent public library and scientific museum, both of which are open to students of Riverview. The buildings are located on a beautiful site, seven acres in extent, on an eminence near the Hudson River, and are fitted with all modern improvements. It is the aim of the Academy to do work of the best and most thorough character.

Finance and Commerce

AS the time approaches for Congress to assemble, its probable action in the matter of declaring gold to be the basis for exchanges in this country becomes more and more the subject of interest. No doubt a strong effort will be made to have such action taken, and were we to credit the claims of many newspapers and politicians, we could easily regard it as a foregone conclusion. We have only to think back to many former like situations, however, to conclude that what Congress will do in regard to any problem of supreme political importance is by no means so easy to prophecy. We are therefore likely to have more or less uncertainty upon this point to confront us for some months to come.

In the meantime we are not suffering for any immediate action. As a matter of fact, financial and commercial affairs are running smoothly enough to suit anyone. Action by Congress at this time is only urged upon the theory that "in times of peace prepare for war." When everything in a business way is prosperous and healthy get ready for breakers. It has, however, never been the way of Congress or politicians to cross their bridges until they get to them, and it is a matter of at least a little doubt whether this leopard has changed his spots since the circus came this way last.

The business situation remains the same. Activity prevails in all quarters. The production and distribution of all classes of commodities is at a maximum. Some close watchers of events think railway earnings show signs of having reached the high point for this era, but this, if true, is not alarming, as they are tremendously heavy. The stock market gives no sign that the general estimate corresponds to this, as the list remains strong at only slight reactions from top prices. In financial affairs little change is noticeable. Money is in fair supply and rates are steady. The last bank statement was less favorable, returns showing a decrease of nearly three million dollars, but an increase in loans of nine million nearly accounts for this. It hardly seems probable however, that the wheat crop of the Northwest can be marketed without making something of a drain on eastern banks. A good export demand which now exists and which is fairly likely to continue, will abate the intensity of it; wheat has lost something in price the past week, while English markets have made a slight gain, so that for the first time in months our markets may be said to be fairly on a shipping basis. Supplies of the crops of wheat from the southern hemisphere are about exhausted, and importing Europe must soon begin to draw more freely from the United States. Foreign demand for corn and provisions is first class. Real estate alone, remains dull, but the past has always shown that it requires several years of prospering business to start any great buying force into real estate.

Trade With West Indies

EXPORTS from the United States to Cuba, Puerto Rico, Hawaii, and the Philippines were, according to a statement just prepared by the Treasury Bureau of Statistics, larger in the fiscal year just ended than in any preceding year in the history of our commerce with those islands. Even the reciprocity years, 1892, 1893, and 1894, in which the exports from the United States to Cuba and Puerto Rico were greatly increased, do not show as large a grand total as does 1899, with all of the disadvantages of war conditions which prevailed in Cuba, Puerto Rico, and the Philippines during a part of the year. To Cuba, the total export for the year does not reach the large figures of the two full fiscal years 1893 and 1894, in which the reciprocity treaty with Spain was in operation, and to Puerto Rico the total export of 1899 was slightly less than that of 1892, during three-fourths of which the reciprocity treaty was in operation, or 1894, in all of which it operated. To Puerto Rico the total exports of the fiscal year 1899 are nearly 25 per cent. in excess of the average annual export during the preceding decade; to Cuba they are nearly 50 per cent. greater than the average during the preceding decade. Hawaii, they are more than twice as much, and to the Philippines, more than three times as much as the average annual exports during the preceding decade. These figures, it is proper to add, do not include the exportations to the islands in question by the government, either for the use of its troops, or in aid of the temporarily destitute.

While the total imports into the United States from these islands is not as large as in earlier years of the decade, this is due solely to the fact that they did not have the supplies for exportation, this being especially true of Cuba, whose sugar plantations and works were so largely destroyed during the war with Spain. That our imports from these islands are rapidly increasing, however, is shown by the fact that those from Cuba in the year 1899 were 66 per cent. greater than in 1898; those from Puerto Rico, nearly 50 per cent. greater than those of the fiscal year 1898, and those from the Philippines nearly 20 per cent. in excess of those of last year, while those from Hawaii show a slight gain over last year, and an increase of 30 per cent. over the fiscal year 1897.

South American Trade

Ecuador, which lies directly north of Peru, has an area of 120,000 square miles, and a population of 1,272,000. Although lying directly under the equator, the great elevation of its tablelands gives very considerable variety to its products. Its chief imports are cottons and other tissues, provisions, manufactures of iron and steel, clothing, and mineral oil. Fronting as it does only on the Pacific, its distance by water from the eastern part of the U. S. is very great, and, as a consequence, its purchases are largely from European countries. The exports from the U. S. to Ecuador have never reached $1,000,000 annually.

Bolivia being entirely an interior country and having no seaport, the official statistics are fragmentary and largely estimates. The total imports in 1897 are estimated at 24,467,100 bolivianos (value of boliviano, 43 cts.). Bolivia has an area of 567,360 square miles, or considerably greater than that of the entire group of Southern States east of the Mississippi River.

AN EVIDENCE OF PROSPERITY.

It is generally conceded by economists who study the commercial situation of the country, that the great arteries of railway travel are a sure indication of its condition. A depression in commercial lines means abandoned business trips and the cancellation of pleasure travel, while a healthy condition of affairs means business trips and an increase of passengers on pleasure bent.

A good evidence that a business revival has gone broadcast over this country is the "Lake Shore Limited," the star train of the Vanderbilt system, between New York and Chicago, which is daily comfortably filled. With a view to taking the best possible care of its patrons, the New York Central has arranged to increase the equipment of this train by placing an additional standard sleeper on the trains every day. To the regular traveler the appointments and comforts of this train are well known, but if you have never made a trip on it, you owe it to yourself to see and enjoy the advance made in comfort and luxury in modern railway travel. Remember the fare is no higher on this train, except between New York and Chicago, while the accommodations and service place this particular train conspicuously at the head of the list, when compared with other lines.—Albany Journal

The Washing of Colored Goods

TOO much emphasis cannot be placed upon this matter of the color of prints and like fabrics. A great many housewives are content to soak, boil and rub delicate shades till only a muddy semblance of the original coloring remains, justifying themselves by the plea that the fault is in the printing of the goods; but it is a fact that most of the colors, except of cheap stuffs, especially those which are "warranted," may be washed repeatedly with little deterioration, if the proper care is taken. Red table linens, embroideries, and goods of that class, which lose all their attractiveness if the clear, pure color is damaged, should never be allowed to get very much soiled before washing, otherwise it is next to impossible to get them thoroughly clean without injury to the hues. They should be washed quickly, in water in which a little powdered borax has been dissolved, rinsed in tepid water containing a little boiled starch, and after drying in the shade, should be ironed before they are fully dry.

Muslins should be washed with a fine soap in soft, cold water; warm water should not be used even for rinsing. Experts say that the colors can best be preserved as follows: If green, add to the rinsing water a wine-glassful of vinegar; for lilac the same quantity of ammonia; for black and white, a small quantity of sugar of lead. A gill or two of lye added to a pailful of water will brighten the black color of any class of goods; while the addition of a teaspoonful of black pepper to the rinsing water is recommended for black calico or cambrics, as a preventive of fading.

No washing powders or washing liquors of any sort should be made use of in washing black stockings, and they should be washed in soft water, soft lather first, and instead of wringing them out hard, which is the common process, and by which, at all events, certain portions of the dye must be expected to be removed, they should be rolled up in a dry cloth and have the moisture well pressed out, and be dried quickly afterward. Nothing could be more melancholy looking than the rusty, white black stockings of years gone by, after they had been a short time in use, and the blue-black color of the new dyes gives them an excellent appearance. Another authority says all fancy hosiery should be put into a strong solution of salt and cold water before wearing, well saturated and dried, without wringing and without exposure to the sunlight.

Colored stockings, as well as other dark goods should have suds especially and carefully made for them, and should not follow white clothes in the same suds, which would leave them linty and dull. For this purpose a pure, white soap is best, and the water should be simply warm—never boiling, or even scalding. Use plenty of water for rinsing, and it will be the better if a little salt is added, or in the case of black stockings, a spoonful of black pepper, to brighten and retain the color.—Good Housekeeping.

Notes of the World's Progress

A PROPOSAL LAST WEEK TO form an American company to control commercial interests in China indicates a desire on the part of China to have a friendly nation assume direction of branches of commerce which would otherwise ultimately be taken in charge by some one of the nations engaged in appropriating the country. Coming from a Chinese official of high standing, the proposition possesses a significance which would not characterize it if from another source. This official states that the Chinese government is ready to grant every trading, contracting and commercial concession, such as an American might ask for. To prevent total annihilation, the kingdom is obliged to secure a commercial alliance with some strong nation. Under present conditions, requests by foreign interested powers for commercial privileges amount practically to demands, and China herself is powerless to repel aggression.

— x —

IT IS NOT UNLIKELY THAT AT THE coming session of Congress some steps will be taken to modify the Chinese Exclusion Act. As in force at present, no exception can be made, and thus its operations are at times diametrically opposed to justice. The principal object of the Act was to relieve labor of a condition which threatened disaster to American workingmen in sections where Chinamen could be hired at a mere nothing. It is, of course, essential that legal bars be not let down to cheap Chinese labor, but circumstances arise at times when exceptions to some provisions of the Act should properly be made. For example, on board the "Olympia," which is now bearing Admiral Dewey toward New York, are a number of Chinamen who served with distinction in the engagement at Manila Bay. These men were servants, but when emergency arose they rendered valuable assistance. Under the terms of the Exclusion Act, they may not set foot on American soil, but should they do so, it is probable no action would be taken.

REVOLUTIONISTS HAVE OVERTHROWN the government in San Domingo. President Figuero resigned his office Aug. 31st, this action being the result of a series of revolutionary successes which demonstrated the power and influence of the insurgents. It is probable that Juan Isidoro Jimenes, who instigated the trouble, will be elected to the presidency. A curious feature of the affair is the indifference with which the revolution was regarded by a large percentage of the population of the island. The approach of rebel troops was, in most cases, immediately followed by surrender of the government forces, and alliance of the latter with the rebel cause. It is probable that, inasmuch as the president has resigned, cities now holding out will surrender without further resistance. Except in cities where business was naturally depressed, owing to disturbances, the commerce of the island has not been particularly affected, and the whole country is in a prosperous condition.

— x —

THE ANNUAL REPORT OF H. CLAY Evans, Commissioner of Pensions, shows that while the list of pensioners decreased during the year just closed, the amount expended increased, being now $131,617,961. This is due to the higher average annual value of pensions. The total number of claims filed during the year, including those on account of the war with Spain, was 48,765. The administration of Mr. Evans has been on the whole satisfactory to the majority of those with whom he or his subordinates had to deal, although much antagonism was aroused over his efforts to prevent abuse of the pension privilege. The generosity of the government affords an opportunity for unprincipled claimants to take advantage of measures enacted for the benefit of the worthy. Precautions taken by the administration in making a physical examination of every soldier before giving him honorable discharge, will probably be of great benefit in years to come in preventing unworthy claimants from obtaining pensions under false pretenses.

SAM JONES, MAYOR OF TOLEDO, is a candidate for the governorship of Ohio, running on an independent ticket. Mr. Jones has already achieved a reputation for the manner in which he disappointed the politicians of his State in the recent campaign for the mayoralty of Toledo. Leaders of political organizations and newspapers were against him, and they are still marveling because of the magnitude of his majority over "regular" candidates. Mr. Jones made his mayoralty canvass on a platform consisting of the Golden Rule, and his campaign for gubernatorial honors is being conducted on the same basis. There is a similarity between Mr. Jones and Governor Pingree, of Michigan. Both were for the people. Mr. Pingree moved from the office of mayor of Detroit to that of governor of Michigan, and if the people of the State of Ohio manifest the same spirit as did those of the Wolverine State, there is a possibility that while Republicans and Democrats are waging bitter war against each other, somebody else may make away with the bone of contention.

OPTIMISTS CLING TO THE HOPE that differences between English and Boers in the Transvaal may be settled without resort to arms, but developments of the past week are somewhat discouraging. The greatest activity prevails in the Transvaal, women and children being sent to places of safety, while other inhabitants are leaving localities where anti-British feeling is strongest. Nearly every Boer capable of bearing arms is prepared to resist to the utmost the demands of Great Britain. Within the week, it is reported, President Kruger has withdrawn concessions offered for a peaceful solution, and his attitude indicates that the question of British suzerainty must be conclusively decided. Correspondents of foreign papers have left Johannesburg, thereby avoiding arrest. Should war break out, it is feared the whole of South Africa would be embroiled.

— x —

ANOTHER MOVEMENT IS ON FOOT for the organization of farmers of the Mississippi Valley, the ruling spirit being W. N. Allen who organized the Farmer's Alliance, which rose, flourished, and faded. The new body is known as the Farmers' Federation of the Mississippi Valley, and is capitalized at $20,000,000, divided into shares of a par value of $10 each. The object of the federation is to do away with the present method of handling and selling grain, and save to members that amount of money now retained by buyers, commission men, etc; to regulate and control the sale and shipment of farm products, and to do such banking business as may be convenient for the organization to accomplish its ends.

SENATOR BEVERIDGE, OF INDIANA, believed to be the youngest man ever elected to the United States Senate, suddenly finds himself in the public eye, especially on account of his reticence. Mr. Beveridge has just returned from a trip to the Philippines, where he made an exhaustive study of the situation, and on his return to the United States was given an opportunity by the press to give his "views." This he politely but firmly declined to do, so in lieu of opinions, the advanced school of journalism regaled the public with descriptions of the clothing worn by the Senator and his wife. So far, Mr. Beveridge has made no expressions, and probably will not until the Senate assembles. As a conspicuous example of silence and eminent modesty, Senator Beveridge stands unparalleled.

AND NOW IT IS THE TURN OF BRAZIL to take the centre of the South American revolutionary stage. It is a time of depression when Central or South America cannot furnish a revolution to order. This time it is the people of the State of Amazonas, Republic of Brazil, who are discontented, not by reason of dissatisfaction with the government of Rio de Janeiro, but because of a well grounded belief that the State of Amazonas is unduly taxed to maintain less wealthy and less productive States of the Republic. Brazilian finances are not in the most excellent condition, but the prosperity of Amazonas has been uninterrupted. The rubber industry in that State, which is about the size of Texas, is in a thriving condition, and furnishes the government with revenue to be expended in less prosperous States. The people have therefore concluded they should be free and independent, and have a government of their own.

Diocese of Ottawa

The diocesan report shows what progress has been made in Church work there during the past year. Five new churches have been built, and there are in the diocese at present 120 churches and 100 Sunday schools. There were 927 infants and 42 adults baptized during the year, and nearly 800 persons confirmed. A liberal collection in aid of the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge was taken up in all the churches in the diocese on the first Sunday in August. Success is meeting the efforts of the committee appointed to canvass the parish of St. John's church, Ottawa, to ask for contributions to clear off the debt. Clergymen have been appointed by the Bishop to the two new missions of Maberly and Russell. The deputations to visit the parishes throughout the diocese, and hold meetings, and in other ways increase interest in the mission work of the Church, have been appointed by the Bishop.

Diocese of Algoma

Several changes have been made amongst the clergy, in consequence of which Bishop Thornloe has one or two vacant missions, and would be glad to hear of suitable men to fill them. The Bishop was visiting posts up the Nepigon river in July. The Rev. A. F. Allman preached his farewell sermon in St. Paul's church, Uppington, July 30th. He has undertaken the charge of St. Mark's church, Emsdale.

Diocese of New Westminster

Much regret is felt at the serious illness of Bishop Dart, who has lately returned from a hard winter's work in England, in the interests of his diocese. Much diocesan work was awaiting him, many Confirmations are necessary, and there are seven new churches to be consecrated. It is thought that Bishop Perrin, of Victoria, however, will kindly perform episcopal functions during Bishop Dart's illness. The new chancel of St. Peter's church, Revelstoke, was used for the first time in July.

New York

Henry Codman Potter, D.D., LL.D., Bishop

St. Bartholomew's parish has lost one of its most prominent members, in the death of Gen. T. A. Davies.

Farewell Sermon

The Rev. B. F. De Costa, D.D., preached his last sermon as rector of the church of St. John the Evangelist, on Sunday, Aug. 27th, taking for his text "First the blade, then the ear, after that the full corn in the ear."

Brotherhood of St. Andrew

The Brotherhood of St. Andrew, of Westchester Co., held its August conference at St. Mark's church, Tarrytown. There was a largely attended and interested session in the afternoon. At the night service, the Rev. S. A. Weikert, of Christ Church, Poughkeepsie, was the preacher.

New Rector at St. Mark's

The vestry of St. Mark's church has issued a circular to the congregation, announcing its action in the election of the Rev. Loring W. Batten, Ph.D., as rector of the parish, and bidding him a hearty welcome to his new duties. The Rev. Dr. Batten entered upon the rectorship on the first Sunday in September.

Intercession for Sunday Schools

It is announced that days of intercession for Sunday schools are appointed for Sunday, Oct. 15th, and the day following. An effort is making to have a general observance in parishes, with Eucharistic celebrations, devotional meetings of teachers, and services for children, and with request that the clergy will call attention to Sunday school work in sermons or addresses.

New Rector Chosen

At a meeting of the vestry of the church of St. John the Evangelist, on Aug. 28th, the resignation of the Rev. B. F. De Costa, D.D., as rector, was accepted, and he was elected rector emeritus. At the same meeting the vacancy in the rectorship was filled by the election of the Rev. Arthur B. Howard. The Rev. Mr. Howard is a graduate of Ohio State University, and of the theological department of Kenyon College, Gambier, O.

Work at St. Peter's

New evidence has been discovered strengthening the theory that the burning of St. Peter's church, Westchester, was caused by an incendiary. Services in the chapel will be continued indefinitely, as it will probably be several months before repairs to the church will be sufficiently far advanced to permit of its occupation. A retreat for clergy will be held in this parish during September, despite the fire. It will be conducted by the Rev. J. O. S. Huntington, of the order of the Holy Cross.

Notable Missionary Gathering

A notable farewell service for Missionaries was held in the chapel of the Church Missions' House, New York City, on Friday, Sept. 1st, at 11 o'clock. The Holy Communion was celebrated by the Bishop of New Jersey who is the chairman of the committee of the Board of Managers on China and Japan. The address was made by the Rev. Dr. Beverley D. Tucker, of Norfolk, Va., the father of one of the appointees. More outgoing missionaries were brought together at this time, it is believed, than ever before. Departing for Japan for the first time, are four young clergymen and two young women who have been trained in the Philadelphia Deaconess House. They will be accompanied by the Rev. Messrs. Patton and Ambler (re-appointed) and their families, and Miss Williamson, who are returning to the field. For China, there are two young clergymen and a young woman from Hartford. Passages have been engaged by steamer, sailing from San Francisco on Sept. 19th, for all except two of these. Miss Williamson may possibly go by another vessel, and the lady appointed to China will delay her departure for a month or two. The Rev. Barnabas T. Sakai, S.T.B., who came from Japan for higher education and is now about to return, was also present.

Boise

Rt. Rev. J. B. Funsten, Bishop

Episcopal Visitations

It is seldom that a parish in the mission field has the privilege of entertaining, at the same time, two bishops, but that has been Boise's good fortune, in having the first Bishop of Idaho, Bishop Tuttle, and the new bishop within its borders. It is 33 years since Bishop Tuttle came to his vast jurisdiction and found the present structure of St. Michael's church at Boise, the only church within the limits of Idaho, Utah and Montana. During his years of hard labor in those pioneer days, he built churches and made Churchmen, so that on his visit this year he finds the children of those whom he baptized years ago, the mainstay of the Church in many missions. It is an interesting fact that Bishop Tuttle when elected, had not reached the canonical age for consecration, but after a hard year's work, went to New York and was consecrated. Large congregations greeted him wherever he went, people driving long distances to see him again. No less hearty is the welcome given Bishop Funsten, who is going over the jurisdiction, cheering the missionaries and the faithful, so long without a chief shepherd. The Bishop spent a week at Boise, preaching in St. Michael's at the morning and the evening services on Aug. 20th. The people are delighted with his personality and spirit of deep consecration.

Indian Work

An interesting development in Indian work promises to be that of the Fort Hall reservation. The Conn. Indian Association has deeded to the Bishop a tract of 160 acres, equipped with a school and other buildings necessary for work among the tribe. The Bishop spent a day at the reservation, and was much pleased with the many encouraging features he found. The Bishop visited Silver City and De Lamar, two mining camps far removed from a railroad. The people of Silver City have been for several years without a missionary, but have built by their own efforts a beautiful little church, at a cost of $2,000. At the first service held in it in June, by the Rev. C. E. Denel, of Boise, there were 13 Baptisms, and it was a significant fact that the first offering taken was devoted to foreign missions.

New Church at Boise

At Boise the contracts have been let for the basement of a new stone church, to cost about $15,000. Mr. H. L. Congdon, of New York, is the architect, and it is hoped there will be no further delay in the erection of a structure so much needed. It is hoped and expected that the Bishop will make this place his see city.

District of Laramie

Anson R. Graves, D.D., LL.D., Missionary Bishop

Bishop Graves' Visitations

The Bishop has finished his spring and summer visitations, having made 67 visitations and confirmed 152. A large number of these stations he had never visited before, being in that portion of Wyoming which was set off to him last fall. More than one-half of the clergy have changed since Bishop Graves took charge of these places. Still all the places are now occupied, and the work going on successfully. The Rev. A. W. Bell, lately from Texas, is now in charge of Sheridan, which was then vacant. The Rev. Wm. Toole is in charge of a string of missions in the Snake River Valley which were never worked by a clergyman before. The Rev. Mr. Dodds is in charge of Rawlins, which was resigned by Mr. Bateman in June. The Very Rev. James Cope is now dean of the cathedral at Laramie, which had been temporarily filled by the Rev. J. M. Johnston. The Rev. C. E. Snavely has charge of the missions in Crook and Weston counties, most of which had been vacant for some time. The parish at Kearney will be filled Sept. 1st by the Rev. W. S. S. Atmore, lately from Jacksonville, Fla. Mr. A. A. Gilman, one of our divinity students, has been filling the vacancy at Grand Island during his vacation. The Rev. Charles Ferguson has just left the stations of Broken Bow and Callaway for Tucson, Arizona, and his place will soon be filled, it is expected, by the Rev. Mr. Hardman, of Idaho.

The Rev. L. A. Arthur has come to us from Detroit, and taken up the work at Ord and neighboring stations. The Bishop put in his summer at Laramie getting the cathedral parish in good working condition for the new dean, and will take his own vacation the latter part of September near Lake Itasca in the woods of Minnesota. Everything is in good shape for the fall and winter's work, with every prospect of a general advance along the whole line.

Nebraska

George Worthington, S.T.D., LL.D., Bishop

Anniversary at Omaha

On August 24th, St. Bartholomew's Day, the anniversary of the ordination of the rector, the Rev. Dr. Reilly, was observed at St. Matthew's church, Omaha, by celebration of Holy Communion. Dr. Reilly was celebrant, assisted by the Rev. G. E. Walk, M.A., of Council Bluffs, Iowa. The Rev. R. D. Stearns, of the diocese of Michigan, was epistoler, and the Rev. T. I. Purdue, of DeWitt, Neb., was gospeller. The Rev. C. H. Young, of St. Andrew's, Omaha, preached a forceful sermon on the office of priesthood in the Church of God. About a dozen visiting clergy and a large congregation participated in the service, and the vested choir rendered the music efficiently. The rector was the recipient of many expressions and tokens of esteem from his parishioners and others. After the service, the clergy were entertained at luncheon by Mrs. Reilly at the rectory.

Oklahoma and Indian Territory

Francis Key Brooke, D.D., Missionary Bishop

Mission at So. McAllister

A glorious Mission of eight days has just been concluded at All Saints', So. McAllister. The Mission was conducted by the Rev. F. E. J. Lloyd, Mus. Doc., of St. Mark's church, Cleveland, O. The spiritual tone of the mission has apparently, by God's blessing, been greatly elevated. Adults have been brought to Baptism, children have been baptized, and from present indications, we should have from 12 to 15 well instructed candidates for Confirmation upon the next visitation of our beloved diocesan. Dr. Lloyd, during his vacation, conducted a Mission with similar results in St. John's, Vinita, I. T., where his venerable and devoted father is in charge.

Long Island

Abram N. Littlejohn, D.D., LL.D., Bishop

The Rev. Wm. T. Fitch, assistant at St. Bartholomew's church, has been in charge for several months past, during the absence of the rector, the Rev. Turner B. Oliver, in Europe. He is now taking a vacation at Northfield, Vt., where he will remain until October the 7th.

Will Erect a Chapel

The members of the church of the Nativity, Mineola, have decided to build a new chapel to cost about $2,500, and subscriptions are already being received for the fund.

Work at Hicksville

A chapel is to be established at Hicksville, to be in charge of the clergy at Garden City, cathedral of the Incarnation.

New Chapel at Babylon

The chapel erected by Mr. August Belmont, on a site in the rear of his residence on the Nursery Farm at North Babylon, is now completed and practically ready for consecration. It is a handsome edifice of brick, Gothic in architecture. The interior woodwork, also pews, choir stalls, lectern, etc., are of chestnut. There is a fine pipe organ on the left of the chancel. In the spire is a small, deep-toned bell. It is Mr. Belmont's intention to have regular Sunday services, and the Rev. George Downing Sparks, rector of Christ church, West Islip, will be asked to officiate. There is to be a commodious carriage shed erected near the chapel, and the grounds surrounding it and sloping down to the large lake, are to be laid with flower beds and shrubbery.

Resigns His Curacy

The Rev. William Worthington, curate of St. Peter's church, Brooklyn, having accepted the rectorship of St. Luke's church, East Greenwich, R. I., will enter upon his duties there the second Sunday in September. He conducted his last service as assistant at St. Peter's on Sunday, Sept. 31. Mr. Worthington has been connected with St. Peter's for a number of years, and is very much beloved by rector and parishioners.

Maine

Henry Adams Neely, D.D., Bishop

Fiftieth Anniversary

The celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of the founding of Grace church, Bath, took place August 19th and 20th. The evening of the 19th, a reception at the parish house was tendered to the members and friends of the parish. Sunday morning, the sermon was by the Rev. Charles F. Lee, of Newcasttle, Me., and at the evening service remarks were made by the rector, the Rev. Walter C. Stewart, the Rev. John Gregson, of Wiscasset, a former rector of the parish; the Rev. Herman Lillienthal, of Wethersfield, Conn., and Robert H. Gardner, Esq., of Boston, grandson of the first rector. Letters had been received from former rectors and friends unable to be present, and one from the Bishop read. Besides those of the clergy mentioned above, the Rev. John Williams, curate of the church of the Heavenly Rest, New York, assisted in the morning service. Special music added to the celebration.

Arkansas

Henry Niles Pierce, D.D., LL.D., Bishop
Wm. M. Brown, D.D., Bishop-Coadjutor

Bishop Pierce Ill

The readers of THE LIVING CHURCH will be sorry to hear that the Rt. Rev. H. N. Pierce, D.D., LL.D., Bishop of Arkansas, is critically ill at the home of the Rev. James J. Vaulx, Fayetteville, Ark. The Bishop, who is nearly 80 years of age, left his home in Little Rock about the 10th of August to make a special visitation at Eureka Springs, Ark., which is a summer resort among the Ozark Mountains, 200 miles north. On the way, he stopped off to see his old friends at the Fayetteville rectory, where he has long been accustomed to spend two or three weeks every year. While there, he was taken ill. His condition soon became serious, and has continued so ever since. His son, the Rev. A. W. Pierce, is with him. His many friends throughout the State, both in and out of the Church, are much concerned. In all the churches the prayer for the sick is being offered on behalf of our venerable and beloved diocesan.

Ohio

Wm. Andrew Leonard, D.D., Bishop

The Rev. Henry E. Cooke, of Trinity church, San Francisco, has accepted a call to Christ church, Warren, formerly in charge of Archdeacon Abbott. He will begin work Sept. 15th.

Gaylord—Carmen

The Rev. Herbert Lee Gaylord, curate of Trinity cathedral, and Miss Elizabeth Carmen were married in the cathedral chapel, on Tuesday, Aug. 29th, Canon Hall officiating. They left at once for a trip up the lakes, and will be at home at the Cathedral House, about Oct. 1st.

Improvements at Gambier

The summer vacation is likely to prove too short for the extensive repairs and building operations that are in process of carrying out at Gambier. Through the generosity of Mr. Samuel Mather, a new heating plant has been provided for Bexley, Rosse, and Ascension Halls. Bishop and Mrs. Leonard are remodeling and enlarging the chapel of the Theological Seminary. For services on Sunday, the theological students attend the college church of the Holy Spirit, but on week days, prayers are said in a small chapel in Bexley Hall. Some time since the Bishop provided the chapel with beautiful oak stalls, and he is now making extensive changes which will add greatly to the beauty and solemnity of the little place of worship. But one addition will be made this year to the corps of instructors. James Byrnie Shaw, Sc.D., has been appointed instructor in mathematics.

Missouri

Daniel Sylvester Tuttle, D.D., Bishop

By special invitation, the Rev. J. H. Cloud, of St. Louis, general missionary to the deaf in Western and Northwestern dioceses, officiated for the second time as chaplain of the alumni association of the Missouri State School for the Deaf, on the occasion of its third re-union at Fulton, Sept. 1-5

North Dakota

Samuel C. Edsall, D.D., Bishop

New Rector at Dickinson

Bishop Edsall has appointed the Rev. Charles E. Dobson, formerly of Dickinson, to take charge of the Episcopal work at Park River, Milton, Langdon, and Inkster. Mr. Dobson will reside at Park River, and will begin his duties next Sunday.

The new rector, the Rev. H. B. Ensworth, arrived in Wahpeton, Tuesday evening, Aug. 22d, and officiated at the service Sunday morning, at Trinity church. For several weeks Dr. R. H. Devine has been acting as lay-reader. The people are united and enthusiastic.

Urgent Need for Workers

It seems to us that the success of missions is in no wise more strongly emphasized than by the bishops' calls from the world over for more workers.

We thank God and congratulate ourselves that the Board of Managers has been able to respond to so many such calls during the year which closed on the 31st ultimo. It is a source of great regret, however, that no response has been made to Bishop Rowe's urgent and long-standing request for a clergyman for Point Hope, Alaska, and his wish for one or two other appointments. It is, moreover, a great disappointment to all that the plan for sending a Presbyter to take the immediate charge at Cape Mount, Liberia, has so far failed by the final declination, after full acceptance, of the one who was chosen.

Bishop Graves needs two more physicians (several names are now before the Board), and Bishop McKim is asking for a missionary physician for Tokyo, and writes hoping that all the women who apply, being found suited to the work, after training, may be sent out to him.

These demands, however, come not only to us. There is scarcely a mission in the various foreign fields that is not in most urgent need of more laborers. For an instance, in the diocese of Guiana there are a great many aboriginal Indians besides the 150,000 negroes, 130,000 East Indian coolies, and some thousands of Chinese, and the missions to each of them are insufficiently manned. Concerning those to the Indians, the Rev. J. G. Pierson, of the diocese, in addressing the members of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, said that they suffered materially from the lack of workers.—Spirit of Missions.

ONE thing that I think differentiates us from most, if not all other, Christian bodies is the feeling we have towards the Church, as that of children towards their mother. This is an eminently proper feeling; for the Church is our mother. She cares for, protects, nourishes, and instructs us.—Bishop Coleman.

Editorials and Contributions

WE printed last week an appeal for poor Puerto Rico, issued by the Bishop who is in charge of the interests of this Church in that island. The appeal should be emphasized until a wide response enables our representatives at Ponce, San Juan, and elsewhere, to extend intelligent aid in the name of Christ and the Church, to the poor people who have been so terribly smitten. It is hoped that our clergy and laity will see the need of turning their donations in this particular direction, rather than in others where the Church will not have the credit, nor her faithful agents on the island the disbursing. And there should be no delay. In some of our dioceses the bishops have authorized a general collection in all the churches.

SOUTH AMERICA seems, from most accounts, a most unlikely field of Church reform. Indeed, we have become accustomed to the idea that reform within the Roman Catholic Church on that continent is a simple impossibility, and that there is no way out except to plant Protestant missions there. We have seen a map of South America which conveyed to the eye the impression that the whole land was enveloped in the darkness of paganism, save a few favored spots where such missions have been established. Recent events in Peru, however, may serve to show that a reform of the old religion is still among the possibilities. The new Archbishop of Lima, with the hearty co-operation of the papal nuncio, is engaged in putting an end to some of the superstitious observances which, with the connivance of the hierarchy in times past, have multiplied exceedingly in that country, and assumed most extravagant forms. This year, for instance, he forbade the strange and childish observances connected with St. Peter's Day, as injurious to the morals of the people and a reflection upon their intelligence. He has also begun to put a stop to the street processions, which occurred every week or two, in which figures of saints were taken from church to church to visit each other! The policy of the Archbishop, it is said, is to reorganize the Church of Peru on the North American plan. He is a young and vigorous man, and is surely worthy of commendation for his desire to elevate the souls entrusted to his care. But the task which he has undertaken is one which might well appall the stoutest heart. When we think of the moral and intellectual condition of the priesthood and the ingrained semi-paganism of the people, the labors of Hercules seem a light matter in comparison with the task Archbishop Tovar has set himself.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, whose "letters to The Times" did so much to fan the flames of dissension last fall, has made haste to send up a shout of triumph over the recent decision of the Archbishops. He regards it as a complete endorsement of his own position, and as committing the episcopacy of England to a course of action which will cut up by the roots the whole system and operation of the "Catholic Revival." If anything were needed to provoke disobedience, it would only be necessary to convince the High Church clergy that Sir William is right in this assertion. Make it clear that the episcopacy, under the leadership of Canterbury and York, intend to initiate a new reformation of this description, and nothing more would be needed to drive them into an absolutely unyielding position. But nothing is more certain than that the Archbishops have not seen the logic of their position in the same light with Sir William, and that they will hardly be coerced into adopting such a line of action. It is much to be hoped that the clergy and laity most concerned will keep their heads, and not suffer themselves to be influenced by political declamation. The attempt to cut at the roots of the Catholic revival has been made at least twice—once in the early days of the movement, when the bishops were unanimous in their attack upon it; and again through the "Public Worship Regulation Act." The results were not reassuring to those who thought thus to defeat a great cause. The present decision is not a renewal of such attempts. It is only necessary to read the text of the present decision to see what an immense advance has been made, as compared with the episcopal utterances of fifty, or even twenty-five, years ago. If the clergy and others who are touched by this decision adopt a wise course, we are of opinion that Sir William Harcourt and his friends will find themselves disappointed.

WE agree with The Churchman in the statement which recently appeared in its columns, that "we are producing no missionary literature worthy of the name." Much of what we find in our journals, in the shape of letters from missionaries, reports of the Board, selections from various writers, and the like, appears to be written or edited to meet the intellectual level of Sunday school children. It is absolutely without effect upon most educated people. The real problems which confront our various missionary undertakings remain almost unknown. We have only incidental references to movements going on in the countries in which we are working, such as are calculated to affect in a profound degree the welfare of missions. Many illustrations might be given of failure to furnish the kind of information which well-informed people desire, and which is often necessary in order to counteract impressions hostile to missions which are so frequently produced by the sayings of travelers, or, nowadays, in some cases by native representatives of the countries concerned and of their ancient religions. Plausible people of this description have had a wide hearing since the Chicago Exposition. The Churchman thinks the defect would be remedied by the appointment of more secretaries. If so, let us have them by all means. But we would suggest that something might be done by men on the spot who would give us somewhat wider information of the circumstances under which they are working.

The American Spirit in Literature

MR. CHARLES JOHNSTON, in The Atlantic for August, discourses on "The True American Spirit in Literature," and decides that it has two distinctive characteristics, which he describes as the absence of the religious atmosphere, on the one hand, and of the aristocratic atmosphere, on the other. In the Old World "the great tradition and mystery of the Church" is everywhere present. Mr. Johnston delineates this with such beauty of expression, that, for a moment, we are almost led to believe that he is under the fascination of its influence. "The atmosphere of the Church," he says, is "an emotional sense of hidden things which quite alters the outward and visible values of life. It wraps to-day round with a sense of past ages, full of divine dealings with the world, taking us back to the sunlit lands of bygone years, to dim, old races that lived in the dawning of the earth. The Church fills life with a sense of the past; it fills life with a sense of the other world, a brooding divinity hovering within this world, yet high above it." All this and much more, with some qualifying expressions which betray the writer's point of view. All the great literary masterpieces of the Old World are saturated with this atmosphere. Contrast with this the atmosphere of Bret Harte's stories and the works of Mark Twain. For it is in these that we find the "true American Spirit." The atmosphere of the Church has faded away, and it leaves us "a set of red-shirted pagans and unprejudiced barbarians," of whom the best that can be said is that they are "very good company and full of purely human kindness."

IN the same way, Mr. Johnston contends that the atmosphere of aristocracy is equally alien from the American spirit. And in the form in which he regards aristocracy, this is no doubt nearer truth than his first proposition. We have no privileged class by hereditary right to stand in convention and tradition for "the best." The relation of master and dependent, with its good side and its bad side, has passed away. This relation, whether it wore the form of owner and slave, lord and serf, or landlord and tenant, was capable of great abuse, yet it also developed elements of character on both sides which it is hard to think may not somehow be perpetuated under other and better forms. As there will always, while the world stands, be a stronger and a weaker element in society, so there will always be a better and also an inferior class. Some will be wiser, some more foolish. There will be types of moral excellence, to inspire respect and reverence. In spite of the influences in education which tend to reduce everything to a dead level, there will still be a more cultured and refined class to stand as a practical ideal of attainment to our youth inspired with the noble desire to excel.

WE do not find fault with Mr. Johnston's statement of the facts as they stand. Doubtless what is most characteristic in American literature may be described in the terms which he employs. It is only another way of saying that that which is seen in certain American writers, as it is seen in no others in the world, is a reversion to the naked pagan and barbaric spirit. But what amazes us is to have this treated, not as a phase belonging to an elementary stage of things, corresponding to the experience of the pioneer settler, cut off from the advantages of civilization, compelled to rough hew his way in the primeval wilderness, and make use of the simple instruments which forest and plain afford, but as a desirable development, a newer realm of life and thought, in advance of that of the Old World. Instead of a warning of the danger which lies in the direction of a too exclusive treatment of the crude forms of life to be found in the mining camp and among the boatmen and wharf-rats of the Mississippi, the writer would actually exhort the rising author to regard the spirit of such life as the spirit to be cultivated, as not simply a striking feature of a certain aspect of American life, but as that which is to be infused into all American literature to make it truly American. "The writers of the future," he says, "must give up everything which depends on the atmosphere of the Church, with its mystery and tradition," and they must equally give up the atmosphere of the palace, the castle, and the court, which latter is a summing up of the writer's conception of "aristocracy."

THE point of view which we have been considering involves much more than at first appears. We are asked to strip away all these things, as the mist vanishes before the rising sun, and to leave simply "plain humanity, standing in the daylight, talking prose." When this is well considered, it is seen that it is, in effect, to ask us to strip away the past, to act as if the world of men had had no history; and not only to strip away the past, but all the influence of the past upon the present. All the long upward struggles of history and the influences and motives which have most powerfully affected the minds of men are to be treated as if they had never been. The treasury of learning and philosophy handed down through the choice spirits of successive generations, and enhanced by the contributions of the greatest minds of every age, is to be cast to the owls and the bats. The glorious masterpieces of the world's literature are to be treated as effete and antiquated, with no more to do with the present than the fossils of the ancient rocks. The religion which has made the most enlightened part of the modern world what it is, is to be completely wiped out as with a sponge. All that is associated with the sentiments of respect for that which is more excellent, of reverence for that which is holy, is to be swept away. "The other world," and all that appertains to it, becomes the subject of a jest, and no sense of hidden things is to be admitted as altering the "visible values" of life in this world.

BUT the spirit of literature is not a thing by itself. It is the expression of the life and thought of men. If it is desirable that our literature should insist upon such ideals as have been described, it is because it is desirable that here in America such should be the ideals of life. The sway of these ideas should be extended to every department. We do, in fact, see much of this tendency in many directions. In politics and in economics it is a common, and perhaps an increasing, tendency to scorn the lessons of history and the results of human experience, under the notion that to this country and its conditions the doings and sufferings of the men of other lands and other times have no relation. They have nothing to teach us. We shall succeed where they, time after time, have failed. What proved the ruin of nations in the past will but enhance our greatness. Again, we have not only put an end to aristocracy in the formal and conventional sense, but we seem to be witnessing the upgrowth of a generation destitute of the sense of respect for any kind of superiority, unless it be of a physical character; and with this goes the capacity of reverence for that which is noble, for moral grandeur, for that which has hitherto been recognized as the goal of human perfection. But, we ask, Is this desirable, Is it to be accepted and fostered? In conclusion, let us say that the writer with whom we have been dealing is woefully wrong when he asserts that the sense of the world invisible and a present God has no relation to morality. In truth, in these things have been found the most powerful of moral motives, and the only ones which are permanent in their influence and in any real sense uplifting. Americans may not, any more than other peoples, continue to be a great and beneficent force in the world without that development of character which can only come from a supernatural religion.

Money Power

FROM THE ANNUAL ADDRESS OF THE BISHOP OF WASHINGTON, 1899

WE are wont to boast of the progress of the nineteenth century; wont to compare its beginning with its ending; the America that Washington, Adams, and Jefferson knew, with the America of to-day. We think of the magnificent cities we have built in North and South, and East and West; of the railways and telegraphs wherewith we have covered the whole country like a net-work; of our enormous increase of wealth. And our people, forgetful of the religious beginnings of our nation, are saying more and more in their hearts, "It is my power and the might of my hand hath gotten me all this wealth." Contrast the sordid spirit which now animates the American people with that of the framers of our Constitution. Contrast the stalwart life of those ancestors, their homespun simplicity, their fidelity to principle, their robust faith in God, with the love of ease and luxury, the all absorbing passion for money, which characterizes our people at the present day. Apply to our own nation the kind of lesson that Gibbon draws in tracing the decline and downfall of the Roman empire; and then think whether in the midst of our boasted progress there are not also signs of decay.

* * *

Gold and silver are the gods to whom our people look for protection, prosperity, and safety. Gold and silver and the balance of trade are the watchwords which express their highest ideal regarding the welfare of their fatherland. Gold and silver is the ruling thought of young men and maidens, of fathers and mothers, of rich men and poor men, of merchants and statesmen, of day laborers and tradesmen; the one ruling passion that blots out the thought of God and of country, blots out family life; and the one ruling aim to which all else is sacrificed as the myriads go forth each day to their work and their labor until the evening.

What a mockery it seems to speak to those in whose breasts such a ruling spirit reigns, of "seeking first the Kingdom of God and His righteousness," or of doing their duty and getting their own living in that state of life in which it shall please God to call them. "We must be practical," they answer back. Well, let us really be practical.

The growth of trusts at the present day is undoubtedly a kind of evil that is threatening the freedom of the people. The vast accumulation of great wealth in the hands of a few, who think only of their private ownership, never of the divine stewardship of wealth or of the tremendous responsibility of those who possess wealth, is another cause for alarm.

There is a mysterious sacredness about money which to me is appalling. With money power we can purchase almost any other kind of power. Not only can we use it in building houses, buying for ourselves lands, securing for ourselves works of art, position in society, education, and the companionship of the great, but we can relieve the necessities of the poor, build hospitals and colleges and churches, send missionaries to the heathen, help in many ways those who are doing God's work in this lower world. The more sacred any power is, the greater is the temptation to pervert it; and by all the warnings of the Bible, and by all the lessons of human history, we learn that wherever or whenever money power is thus perverted, wherever or whenever the stewardship of wealth is thus ignored, a terrible judgment of God upon the land inevitably follows.

We cannot but recognize the prevalence and growth of this evil of irresponsible wealth. Side by side with it we cannot but admit the growing discontent among the masses. Here in America we have no fear of European socialism. But there is something else, a spirit working far below the surface, that we may well dread. It is a feeling of injustice among the masses; a consciousness that they are somehow being wronged; a scowling determination that those wrongs shall be righted. And, like the rumblings of an earthquake, these hidden fires beneath our feet every now and then manifest their presence and their smouldering activity.

Well! Filled with the love of God and of your country, you go among the masses; you become the friend of the poor; you talk to the factory hand and the workingman; you get their point of view, and see more clearly and feel more strongly than ever, that on the laborer's side there are bitter, burning wrongs to be righted; but one gigantic obstacle uprises which prevents their being righted. The poor are just as sordid and covetous as the rich. Give the poor man the opportunity of wealth, or let him once change places with the rich man, against whom he cries so bitterly, and he will become just as cruel and unjust himself. There is, however, this enormous difference between the two. Where the covetous poor man is ignorant, pressed with want and shut out from all opportunities of knowing better, the covetous rich man lives in ease and luxury, possesses ability, education; and, with every opportunity of knowing the truth about himself, deliberately shuts his eyes to it. The ultimate responsibility, therefore, rests with him, for he has the power of righting evils which the poor man is helpless to change.

* * *

If there is a responsibility resting upon the American people, there is a greater responsibility resting upon the Church of God. The Church of God, indeed, recognizes no distinction of persons; it identifies itself with no particular class of men. We are not to take the poor man's side against the rich, or the rich man's side against the poor. Moreover, it is not the business of prophets and priests of God to know about capital and labor, or the needs of commerce. We must leave the intricacies of all such questions to those experts who make political economy their life long study. But we do know something about the human motives which actuate men's lives. And we have as a weapon in our hands that Word of God which is sharper than any two-edged sword in cutting down to the thoughts and intents of the heart. We are pledged to God to stand out as witnesses to the everlasting truth that covetousness is idolatry; and we are bound to teach that truth, in season and out of season, whether our people hear, or whether they forbear.

Once more the Church of God has her own crying temporal needs; she knows just how the poor man feels; she knows just how St. Paul and the first Christians felt. But she should be free from either rich man's or poor man's spirit of covetousness, crying aloud just as St. Paul did at the very time when he was oppressed daily with the care of all the churches, that covetousness is idolatry; and setting all outsiders the example of entire confidence in Christ's holy promise, "Seek you first the kingdom of God and His righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you."

Open Air Processions and Street Preaching

BY THE REV. DUNCAN CONVERS

SEVERAL of the clergy have been interested in the experiment we have been trying, during this summer, at the church of St. John the Evangelist, Boston. Some ask about it. It is easier to send a communication to the papers than to answer individually.

There are two well-defined types of open-air work. One, an independent service, meant to be complete in itself, and the other, auxiliary to a service to be held later in the church. The latter is the kind we have aimed to have.

Why should we? One reason can be given in words overheard as we passed. A mother and daughter stood watching us, when the former asked: "What are they doing?" The daughter answered: "Why, mother, they are following the example of Christ who went out into the streets and lanes of the city to seek the lost." Perhaps the Master's words at His trial, "I ever taught in the synagogues and in the temple," with explicit reference to the same on many occasions, may justify the inference that He usually taught in buildings set apart for religious purposes. But the sermon on the mount, the teaching given the crowd from the ship, and the like, show it was not confined to such buildings.

Ecclesiastical practice in the past makes it older than the modern, unchurchly mode used by the Salvation Army. Out door processions were known to St. Basil, used by St. Ambrose in Milan. Bingham's Antiquities (Book xlii, Chap. I: § 11-12) tells of early ones in Rome and Constantinople. The article in Smith's Dictionary of Christian Antiquities, p. 1716, says: "About the same time the Arians at Constantinople sang hymns, antiphonally, as they went through the city to their church, whereupon St. Chrysostom, to counteract the effect of such public demonstrations, organized processions of the orthodox, in which silver crosses given by the Empress, and lighted tapers were borne, and psalms sung. . . . It is probable that all litanies ordered for a special purpose were sung in procession, though it is not always so expressed." How astonished some of those worthies would be should they know that our "litany" is generally said in a church, and that some of our people are so ignorant as not to know that such were first intended to be processional.

If we are to be "missionaries on a mission," we are to look on ourselves as "sent," not merely to minister to those who come to us into our churches, but to go to seek for those who will not voluntarily come. And such we find on the open streets.

One of the ever present temptations of an endowed church is to work only or mainly for the rich and the well-to do. If we are to conquer this temptation, and to preach the Gospel to the poor—to those whose surroundings are like those chosen for Himself by God Incarnate, we must get beyond the walls of the churches. We can find them on the streets. A worker with us said to a man evidently interested: "Come to church with us." "Oh, I'm not dressed to go," looking down on his rough working clothes. "Come anyway; don't mind your clothes." He took a second survey. "It's not so very bad. Do you think I'm too bad to go?" Of course he went, and was glad of having done so.

What have we done? You can improve on our plan, no doubt. We tell you our experience to enable you to begin thinking. We made our procession, headed by a cross bearer, carrying a broad-faced wooden cross, gilded, which was made for us at a cost of $7.50. Behind him marched, two and two, the men, clad in cassocks and cottas, wearing skull cap, and having a card of hymns. The hymns are mostly processional, or hymns of invitation to church, and are sung to the best known tunes we can get. There are fourteen on our card, but the ones we generally use are:—

The Church's one Foundation.

O happy band of pilgrims.

Souls of men, why will ye scatter?

Rejoice, ye pure in heart.

At the Name of Jesus.

Stand up, stand up, for Jesus.

Onward, Christian soldiers.

There is a fountain filled with blood.

After the singers, two cornetists in cassocks and cottas. Then the priests. It is important to have two, if possible, as the effort to sing on the street and preach at the stations, tires the throat. One alone will probably find that he has no voice left to sing the service and preach in the church afterwards.

Behind comes the auxiliary procession of those who do not wear cassock and cotta, one of whom will take charge of the pulpit; i. e., a wooden chair without a back. Others have the hymn cards to give to any men who seem interested, and who will join them in the auxiliary procession. After the addresses at the stations, and while the cornets are playing over the tune, they offer the cards to the men in the crowd and ask them to come into the procession. Usually we have not had as many ready to do so as we hoped. To the man in the crowd it seems like "confessing Christ before men" to take the open step of leaving the crowd and becoming one of our auxiliary procession. Still, those who do so are sure to come with us to Church and make part of the congregation. We hope some day to learn better how to effect this.

The women interested go on the sidewalks, and not in the street. They are asked to sing the hymns and to invite those they see are interested to come to church. Children are not especially wanted.

As the evenings grow shorter, and it is dark by the time we get to the church, we give each man in the choir or in the auxiliary procession, who starts with us from the church, a torch;

i. e., a candle burning in a clear glass shade on the end of a pole.

At starting, we have gone into the church, and kneeling before the altar, asked God to bless us and our work. Then we sing a hymn, as we go to our first station, where a short address five to eight minutes long, is made. Sometimes, while standing still, a hymn has been sung; but the numbers did not increase during it—on the contrary, lessened slightly. As the crowd was so well behaved, we have sometimes said a prayer. "Hats off, please, while we say a prayer." Nearly all uncover their heads. We commonly said: "O Saviour of the World, who by Thy Cross and Precious Blood hath redeemed us," the rest answering, "Save us and help us we humbly beseech Thee, O Lord," with the Lord's Prayer.

The crowds have been large. Sometimes five or six hundred men—perhaps fifty women; and of children, from twenty five to a hundred. When we start, a few half grown girls giggle, but before we get to the first station they are silent. The men behave well—better than most congregations in church. There is scarcely any talking, no jeers or sneers; but all are respectful. It is a great thing to preach five minute sermons to several hundred men who seldom go to church. It is a gain to have many of them follow into church and stay for the service.

Opinions will differ as to what the service should be. Some will make it a Mission service, in order to make as little demand on the newcomers as possible. Others will think it best to have the Prayer Book office in its integrity, as teaching them more. The first will be the more attractive to the greater number, no doubt. It would be a fatal mistake to neglect the service and sermon in the church, as the procession is a special way of inviting men to come; and if you will not give them something to come for, they will not return, although they may come in once.

After a few weeks, some begin to understand what is coming, and are ready to co-operate. Helpers will come to sing and work. Little knots of people will be found waiting for you. You may find, as we have, active helpers in the police. It was a day of rejoicing when we saw the officers listening to the sermons, taking off their helmets at the prayers, stopping a bicyclist as he rang his bell and shouted for the crowd to give way before him, running down the street to stop a carriage from breaking in upon a prayer, and heard of their talking amongst themselves in the station of "the impressive services."

It was a cause for thanksgiving to see how reverent and well behaved the crowds have been; to see how many were ready to accept the invitation to come to church. It gave fresh point to the saying, "Our age longs to be religious."

Circumstances may make other plans than ours the best for your locality. Yet our experience points to the conclusion that in any densely populated city, an invitation so given on Sunday evenings will be largely responded to. We say "Sunday evenings," for it is impossible to get voluntary helpers each week night, and the crowd would not gather in such numbers then. Yet it might be a grand thing where possible. Our experience makes us say to any working in a dense population where crowds are on the streets in the evening, "Try it. You will not regret that you have so followed the example of Christ."

Letters to the Editor

SUNDAY GOLF

To the Editor of The Living Church:

I thank you for your editorial upon the Sunday golf question in your issue of Aug. 26th. However people, clerical or lay, may differ as to the right or wrong of Sunday golf playing, there cannot be any doubt that it is utterly wrong to allure boys from Church or Sunday school for the purpose of caddying. That it does take boys from religious influence, and from what is often their only religious influence, I have sad proof in the two missions under my charge. In the immediate neighborhood of these mission stations three sets of golf links, two of them owned by large and prosperous clubs, have been recently established, and now on Sundays it is extremely difficult to get any but the smallest boys (too young to caddy) to attend either Sunday school or Church service. Inquiry after boys who used to be regular at either or both is almost invariably met with the information that they are caddying now, and therefore cannot come. As most of the people in the mission field are poor, the money that the boys can pick up as caddies is a great temptation to parents to overlook their desire for the spiritual welfare and instruction of their children (which desire is often weak at best) and to think only of their temporal needs.

While not holding the parents free from blame, it is fair to place the main responsibility upon the Sunday golf players. They do thus plainly put a stumbling block in the way of Christ's little ones, and I cannot but think that if this were brought to their notice many would hesitate thus to imperil the souls of others, even if they stop not at risk to their own. I venture to suggest that Sunday golf players should make it a rule to do their own caddying, for at least part of the day—say up to noon or 1 P. M.—and so give the boys an opportunity of attending Sunday school and Church. Surely no one bearing the name of Christian could object to so slight a modification of Sunday amusement for the sake of those whom the just and loving Christ warned his followers so strongly against hindering in the Way of Life.

Perhaps it may strengthen this suggestion in the eyes of some, when I add that I do not hold that Sunday golf is necessarily sinful. Of course there are limitations, but speaking generally, I think that when religious duties are first attended to (not left till the close of the day when, tired and sleepy from exertion or excited by play, the player is in no fit condition for worship), health of body and relaxation of mind may be sought in golf or any other lawful exercise on Sunday.

THE ARCHBISHOPS' JUDGMENT

To the Editor of The Living Church:

The Archbishops (two) of the Church of England, in their judgment lately delivered, declare incense to be lawful in the Church of England if used to sweeten the church, but unlawful otherwise. This is an unsatisfactory decision. One may use incense during a service to sweeten the church. It would have been far better to have declared its use unlawful at all times and under all circumstances, or lawful. However, in conclusion they "press on all the clergy alike, to submit to episcopal authority in all such matters as these." Well and good; if the clergy now using incense give up its use, will the clergy now failing to use certain lawful adjuncts to worship employ these adjuncts in the future? It is unjust and unreasonable to insist upon a priest's giving up a certain adjunct to worship on the score of its being unlawful, and not to insist upon another priest's using certain lawful adjuncts which he before neglected to use. Sins of omission need to be looked after as well as sins of commission. As I read the Ornaments Rubric, the language concerning the use of these ornaments is mandatory, the words being "shall be in use," and not "may be in use." For the sake of the peace of the Church, which the Archbishops declare "we all so much desire," will the Archbishops see that, not only in ritual but also in doctrine, and the general use of the Book of Common Prayer, all the clergy in word and deed, as exponents of the Church, express the mind of the Church?

From a layman's view, it seems to me that sins of omission are far more numerous and more dangerous to the Church than sins of commission. Uniformity on the lines of definite authority, and in keeping with the apostolic character of the Church in matters of Faith, of service, and of ritual alone will produce the peace

"we all so much desire." Lack of uniformity in these matters must always produce friction. The Church, as a teacher, ought not to be like a weather cock, blown this way and that way by contrary winds. She doubtless has a standard; suppose the Archbishops give us in few words that standard, and insist upon all the clergy, "for the peace of the Church," modulating their expressions concerning the Faith, ordering their services at the different hours, and using the ritual and ornaments in connection with these services, in strict keeping with that standard. Not a Ritualist would object to this, but would the Lows and the Broads do so? If not, who is responsible for any lack of peace in the city of confusion? What we laymen want is doctrine, ritual, and services according to the standard or a standard. If there is a standard, what is it? The Episcopal authority ought to be an authority and enforce conformity on the part of all to that standard. It is idle to talk of peace until with equal justice our bishops enforce conformity on the part of all—Low, Broad, High, and Ritualistic—to the standard in ritual, ornaments, doctrine, and worship.

A PARTY was going the round of the Tower the other day, and on being shown the instruments of torture, one said: "Yes, it's those dreadful things the High Church party wish to bring back."

AT the close of a forenoon session of a ministerial conference, in announcing the opening subject for the afternoon, the presiding officer said: "Elder H. will present a paper on 'The Devil'." Then he added earnestly: "Please be prompt in attendance, for Brother H. has a carefully prepared paper, and is full of his subject." The Homiletic Review says that it was some minutes before the presiding officer understood the laughter which followed his remark.

RUDYARD KIPLING recently received the degree of Doctor of Laws from McGill University, Montreal, whereupon the London Academy exclaims:

"Why have you been so long, McGill?
Where were you when our friend was ill?
It's surely wrong to wait until He's well before you 'doctor' him."

COMMENTING on some recent experiments with alcohol, the Pittsburgh Dispatch says: "Professor Atwater's announcement that if a man absorbs no more than two ounces of alcohol per diem the liquor gives sustenance, is interesting. But its practical value is damaged by the fact that many men, in the fear that they will not get the full two ounces, take two ounces and a half, or even more, in which case the effect is deleterious, not to say disorderly. An overdose of beefsteak and potatoes does not produce such vociferous and undesirable results."

THE attention of English-speaking visitors to the Milan cathedral is readily attracted by the following notice, which appears over an alms-box: Appelle to Charitables. The Brothers, so-called, of Mercy, ask slender arms for the Hospital. They harbor all kinds of diseases, and have no respect to religion.

JUDGEMARTIN GROVER, of Troy, N. Y., was at one time approached by a young citizen who wished to be nominated to the State Assembly. The shrewd old Judge had certain doubts about him, which he expressed somewhat freely, and yet he was willing to afford him a trial. He therefore addressed the aspirant in this way: "Young man, if you will give me your word that you won't steal when you get to Albany, I'll see what kin be done about sendin' you there." "Judge Grover," replied the young man, drawing himself up with great dignity, "I'll go to Albany unpledged, or I don't go at all."

BISHOP GILBERT lately was the guest of the Bishop of Kansas. After his departure, Clarkson, the little son of the latter, asked his father with great earnestness a question which the Coadjutor-Bishop of Minnesota may consider vital: "Papa, is Bishop Gilbert a rich-ulist or a poor-ulist?"

THE London Academy recently awarded the prize for the best imitation of the nonsense verses of Edward Lear to a woman in Newcastle, who sent the following:

"Our minister, Ian MacIaren,
Of copy will never be barren,
Just a smile and a tear
In a dialect queer,
And he's read from the Thames to Loch Carron."

"CAN'T afford it." What? Why, the Church paper that costs two dollars a year! Pause a minute, good friend, and consider. It is an enormous sum, isn't it, to pay for 2,500 columns of reading matter, equal to 5,000 pages of book print, or twenty good-sized volumes! You couldn't buy the bare paper in that form for the money. This reading is composed and selected for you, at great outlay of time and money, and sent to you, postpaid, regularly, in convenient form. It is what you cannot get in books—about the news, the work, and the thought of the Church of to-day. You cannot afford two dollars a year to keep informed about this? How much do you expend for papers and magazines that have no serious purpose and serve for nothing but entertainment? Think it over, and consider whether you cannot, after all, venture on a half-cent a day to secure a good Church paper which will be of benefit and interest to every member of your family—we refer of course to THE LIVING CHURCH.

CONVENTION reports this year show generally a healthy and sturdy growth. The figures of increase are very gratifying. But occasionally there is an item which strikes a discord, and sets one to thinking. The growth is at times peculiar to say the least. For instance, the 1899 Journal of Chicago shows, in comparison with that of 1898, an increase of 408 families, which is a wholesome percentage. But there is reported a growth of only 340 souls, and the question is at once suggested as to the character of these families who have come in, bringing so few souls with them. The question is emphasized by the report of one parish in the diocese which reads thus: "Families, 104; individuals, 50; souls, 100." The rector of this parish will be likely to have a serious task on his hands in explaining the grounds of his opinion concerning his parishioners, should this report come to their notice. The bookkeeping of parochial reports is often a marvelous thing, but we have never before seen perpetrated such a wholesale slaughter of souls.

A MOST upsetting interruption to a preacher, and one richly deserved, is narrated in the very entertaining "Life of Bernard Gilpin," the "Apostle of the North," by George Carleton, Bishop of Chichester about 1630. When Bernard was a little boy, a certain begging friar came one Saturday to the house of his father, intending to preach on the morrow. "The holy friar at supper-time ate like a glutton, and like a beast could not give over tossing the pot." Preaching on the morrow, "he presumed to grow hot against some sinners of the time, and among the rest to thunder boldly against drunkenness. Young Gilpin having but newly got the use of his tongue, and having observed the hateful baseness of the man the night before, as he was sitting neere to his mother's lap in the church, suddainely crieth out in these words: 'O mother, doe you heare how this fellow dare speake against drunkennesse, who was drunke himselfe yesternight at our house?' " Whereupon we are informed that "the mother made speede to stop the childe's mouthe with her hand, that he might speake no further." We may conjecture that he had spoken far enough for the feelings of the "wand'ring companion" in the pulpit, as also for his chances of a collection.

NOW comes the time for work. Thoughts, like persimmons, need the frost for ripening; the rough blasts of autumn and the snows of winter to shake them from the boughs. Vacation and summer-time are good for growth; but the product is not fit to harvest till cold weather comes. Winter work will be a test of summer play. If we have been growing, gathering strength, renewing our vitality, by rushy brook or on the beached margent of the sea, it will appear in the new life and vigor that animates us. We welcome the clergy back to the old paths, and offer THE LIVING CHURCH as a helper in the renewed work that they now undertake. We bid the laity good cheer for the fall campaign! Will the clergy and laity give us a helping hand? Let every Churchman who wants a live paper, send us his name and two dollars.

WE commend to the thoughtful consideration of some of our numerous correspondents (we forbear to mention names), the following delicate hint which we find in an exchange:

ALPHA.—We should be very glad to print your letter if we could read it. The writing is just as if a hen had dipped her foot in ink and then ran across the sheet of paper. No one but yourself can read it. If you could dictate the translation of it to some friend, it might prove a valuable contribution.

Notes from "Eaglesnest"

XI.

CAMPING is one of the eccentricities of our life at Old Mission, and shall have a place in my "Notes." My wife says we are camping here all the time, and she does not care to go from our comfortable wigwam under the pines, to sleep on the ground in a tent, and cook over a smoking fire, and perhaps get caught in the rain. So she stays at home and has the best of it (in a way) while I take the young folks and return to the simplicity of nature.

When I say "simplicity of nature," I use the phrase in a qualified sense, secundum quid! and the remark brings a smile to the face of the One who stays at home. She finds amusing incongruity between my wagon-load of civilized comfort and the "simplicity" to which I refer. Indeed, I have become convinced myself that woven wire springs are not consistent with the ideal to which the poetical or practical camper aspires. I have at last got down to the bosom of mother earth and have slept on the ground. That is to say, very nearly; only a rug and a cot-pad and a comforter and a pillow! An armful of balsam fir branches, picked very fine, completes a bed on which tired nature's sweet restorer is literally "balmy."

While I must admit that the best thing about camping is getting home again, I hold it to be a very helpful and healthful episode of summering. It is a break in the monotony of cottage or boarding-house life; it compels to a degree of physical exercise and hardness, the benefits of which are felt afterwards; it promotes good fellowship and helpfulness; and if it be well managed, it gives good digestion to wait on appetite. But as I said, it is good to get back to home comforts again, and to be able to appreciate and enjoy them better for the temporary deprivation. There is some such recompense in return from foreign travel. We love our own country all the more after seeing other lands.

Much depends on good management in the matter of camping as well as in other affairs. "Why didn't we think to bring that!" is often the exclamation of the amateur campers who find themselves perhaps without salt for their table in the wilderness. Table? Why, certainly. Would you eat off the ground? I always take a table. Two or three smooth boards tied together can easily be carried in the bottom of the wagon or the boat, with the tent poles. With a hand-ax one can cut and drive stakes and set up the table in a few minutes. Benches may be made in the same way, but it is better to take a bundle of camp chairs, which cost but fifty cents apiece. These can be moved to the camp-fire in the evening, and are convenient in the tents. It is well to have a shelter over the table. This can be made by stretching over it a "fly" from one of the tents. A pretty refreshment tent which opens on one side, can be bought for ten dollars, and can be used afterwards on the lawn at home for a play-house for the children.

Some campers take a stove, but it is not needed. A piece of sheet iron, two by three feet, or less, will serve as well. Even that may be dispensed with. Cut two green sticks as large as railroad ties; square the top and one side of each, and place them a few inches apart, hewed surfaces facing; let the end of a pole hang over a crotch near the end of your fire-place; hang on the kettle, and between the logs build your fire of chips cut from an old stump. There you have a woodsman's range on which you can cook for a party of a dozen people as well as in any hotel kitchen. Of course you must know how to cook, and have material for it. Don't bring a lot of pastry and prepared food (except bread), but have the fun and experience of making things for yourself. You will take bacon, and catch fish (if you can), and forage on the neighboring farms for chickens and milk, and pick berries for dessert. I have a camping memorandum of everything that experience has shown we need on such expeditions, under five heads: Camp use, Provisions, Cooking outfit, Table furnishing, Personal. A list of the latter is given to each one to be attended to, and includes bedding, toilet articles, etc. One person should attend to the general outfit, packing and unpacking, and keeping it in order.

I see I have given a good many details, and perhaps would only amuse the reader by filling out the list under each head. One thing, however, I must suggest: Don't think that "camping" requires the use of tin plates, cups, and spoons. Use good, honest, crockery and plated ware, which can be easily cleaned, which are quite as "simple" as tin, and far more satisfactory.

There is little space left, if I would set a good example of brevity to contributors, to give any description of this summer's excursion. We went across the bay, several miles inland, into a wild country where Indians are almost the only people one meets. They are "good Indians," even if they are not dead! An old one came to our camp, and we took a lesson from him in the Chipewa language. After a pleasant hour with us, partaking bountifully of everything we could spare, he took up a collection, and then inquired how much more we would give him to catch some fish for our supper! Yes, they are good, but none too good "for human nature's daily food."

The days passed pleasantly between fishing, rambling, reading, and camp work. The best hour of all was that of the camp-fire. Did you ever see a real camp-fire, where wood is to be had without even asking? It is not worth while to pile it more than ten feet high, for a blaze of twenty feet is about all the eyes will bear with comfort. Stories and songs and jests go round; the fire mounts upward, and the darkness behind us deepens as the flames grow brighter. The world seems to be drifting away from us, as it does in dreams. One scarcely needs a hypnotic suggestion to fancy himself soaring through interstellar spaces on wings of fire, sowing the field of night with stars. But he soon returns to mundane sense and realizes that he is tired. He must be up with the early bird to catch the fish, thankful if he may pass the night without a "bite." The evening hymn is sung; "Lighten our Darkness" is followed by the benediction; the lanterns are lighted, and for a few minutes the translucent tents are all aglow. Then silence and sleep, and the sweet influences of the Pleiades.

There Was No Singing

DOUBT never yet gave birth to music. The newspaper reports of the funeral services of the late Colonel R. G. Ingersoll said: "There was no singing." The fact was deeply significant.

Some kind of music and song is natural and instinctive among the people of every race. It is a human instinct to be touched by the mystic power of music. Music is loved for two reasons. First, because it is impressive; second, because it is expressive. Music wakens chords in the being and life of the soul which otherwise would slumber. The consciousness of such awakened life and emotion is profoundly agreeable. Especially pleasing is it because it wakens the sense of agreement, a feeling of sympathy. Under this spell of music one seems to be less alone in the world. Something without is felt to correspond with something within. Somehow and somewhere the subtle impression is made by music that certain sensitive chords in others' being are in unison with and answer to those in our own being. And in this wakened sense of mutuality and responsiveness there is power. Some are of course more sensitive to it than others. With all, it is a quality peculiarly susceptible to cultivation. But the impressive charm of music is universal.

Christianity, if not the mother of music, has developed a music and song of its own. There is to be found no such music in any heathen country as is found in all Christian countries. Naturally and historically, Christian experience gives birth to Christian music. This is because the Christian experience awakens into power emotions that are peculiar to itself, and which crave musical expression. For souls uplifted into glorious cheer and triumphing trust and hope, mere word-language is not enough; the words need to be touched into music in order to fit the case. That Paul and Silas, scourged and thrust into jail, despite their bleeding wounds, made their dungeon and the midnight ring with their song of praise, was perfectly natural; natural to men whose souls were stirred into such ecstasy as theirs of glorious and blessed fellowship with the Divine One who was thus revealing himself within them. The Gospel of Christ has never gone anywhere that music did not go with it. The history of Christianity is traced in the history of Christian song.

There is no living Church anywhere without its music and song. The modern hymnology is something which the atheist only makes himself foolish trying to account for. There is nothing in his philosophy to explain it. That there should have been no song or music of any kind at the funeral of Colonel Ingersoll was altogether natural. Music there and then would have seemed a mockery. Mr. Herbert Spencer who has spent his life and his extraordinary intellectual ability trying to reason out an explanation of the world by reasoning God out of it, and in the strangely unnatural endeavor to put an "unknowable," eternal IT in place of the Father Almighty, Maker of heaven and earth, was asked not long ago by Mr. Stead to name some hymns that had been of greatest use and comfort to him. His reply was that he was not aware that any hymn had been of particular use to him. When a boy of seven, he added, he had been forced to commit hymns to memory as a punishment. So cruelly, so horribly, in his case, were his life and his life's philosophy poisoned at the foundation, by a prejudice "deep almost as life!"

It is a miracle of Christian testimony to the truth when martyrs go to the stake with triumphing song. It is something as really natural as it is beautiful when dying saints go home on the wings of song. Music at the Christian burial chords perfectly with the fitness and meaning of the occasion.

Truly, pity can not be too heartfelt and profound when any one dies under circumstances which make music of any kind seem dissonant and out of place. Christian gratefulness can not be too constant or too exultant, in view of the fact that music and the new song are the symbols of the new order of things, as already more and more, day by day, the new heavens and the new earth are seen coming down from God out of heaven.—The Interior.

New Baconian Cryptogram

A CORRESPONDENT of the New York Sun, like Ignatius Donnelly, of Minnesota, has been delving into the authorship of the works of Shakespeare, and elucidates a manner by which many of the mysteries of those writings may be made as clear as day. "We know that people in the time of Bacon and Shakespeare," he says, "delighted in verbal conceits, and twisted and fashioned their names in riddles and rebuses. Now, Bacon, in hunting for an anagram, must have noticed that the first and last letters of his name formed the abbreviation for nota bene. The other letters would give C A O, and the rebus anagram would read: 'NBCAO'—that is, 'Take notice! See! a cipher.' This, perhaps suggested to Bacon the great cryptogram. However that may be, we find in one of the earliest of the plays, 'Romeo and Juliet,' an interlude, referring, it would seem, to the question of authorship. The dramatis personæ of this play within a play are not given, but we may infer them to be Posterity, Shakespeare, and Bacon himself. Posterity speaks in the Scottish dialect, which Francis Bacon, with the advent of the House of Stuart in view, might believe would become a fashion. Bacon makes himself speak in this dialect, too, as befitting a courtier.

"Posterity, as though overwhelmed with admiration, utters the single word 'Who?' Shakespeare puts himself forward. And then Bacon interposes and emphatically asserts his claim. The interlude is remarkable in having itself for its title, which, too, is very appropriate. The text follows:

"WHAT'S IN A NAME?"
Posterity.....	WHA?
Shakespeare.....	T'S I
Bacon.....	NA, NA, ME.

"This short and stirring drama is respectfully submitted through the Sun to the literary world at large."

The Latest Testament

SOME remarkable new versions of the Scriptures are in course of preparation by the British and Foreign Bible Society, among them being the New Testament in Dieri, the tongue spoken by a tribe living some hundreds of miles north of Adelaide. The book is notable as being the first complete Testament issued in any of the Australian aboriginal languages. The rendering has been made by some German missionaries, and was transmitted to the London committee by the Chief Justice of South Australia.

To a translation of the Gospel of St. John, made by the Rev. R. Fletcher, into Maya, the language of the Indians of Yucatan and British Honduras, are about to be added versions from the same pen, of St. Matthew and St. Mark; and one of the last acts of that great linguist, Dr. Wright, was to endeavor to secure a rendering into the language of the Vei people, of the West Coast of Africa. From a philological point of view, this is one of the most extraordinary tongues in the world, and it has written characters that are quite unique.

The Church Reporter

SCIENTIFIC annals record no instance of a successful attempt to fathom the depth of the average secular journalist's ignorance in regard to matters and terms ecclesiastical. While he never wholly ceases his operations, the numerous services of Lenten and Easter-tides furnish him especial opportunities to display his talents, which he forthwith proceeds to do, to the amusement of Churchmen and the mystification of others. The accompanying specimens of his efforts are taken for the most part from local papers. Charity, which I hold superior to journalistic ethics, forbids more specific credit. I may state at the outset that our friend is not responsible for the italics; these, wherever they occur, are mine.

His ignorance is all-embracing, from vestments and services to architecture. When a certain church was opened for service, a local sheet, in its description of the building, said: "The interior style is that of an English cathedral, with nave and transcript." It intended, presumably, to say "transepts."

Obviously, the next is chargeable to the intelligent compositor rather than to the reporter. In setting up a Holy Week announcement he has changed just one letter, but he has most assuredly succeeded in selecting the least appropriate one of the entire alphabet. Behold the result: "The services on Food Friday will be as follows." Somewhat on the same order is another (probably not by the typo this time): "To day is Ash Wednesday, the festival which marks the beginning of the season of Lent." A Protestant minister in a magazine article on Holy Week observances in Italy, says: "Good Friday is one of the most important festivals in the whole calendar of the Catholic Church." Truly, one must go away from home to learn.

Our branch of the Church is frequently referred to as the "Anglican Church." This expression (which, by the way, once appeared in our diocesan paper) may be said to be rather more complimentary than accurate; but for a genuine, unadulterated compliment, commend me to the following extract from the published account of a Good Friday "Lantern service": "Stereopticon views were used, presenting scenes from the life of the Saviour, each of which was feelingly described by the rector." This looks innocent enough, certainly; to appreciate it fully we must go beyond the surface, and employ a little extraneous knowledge to see who is being complimented. The "feeling description" referred to consists entirely of a harmonized account from the narratives of the Evangelists. Certainly the reporter can hardly be complimented on his acquaintance with the text of the Gospels.

Last Holy Week I found this: "Palm Sunday was generally observed with the usual ritualistic services. Bishop N. confirmed a class at Holy Trinity, and a special musical programme was observed at Christ church." Horrors! to what further excesses will this "Ritualism" go? And the funniest part of it all is that the one American church in the city where there was a procession with palm branches and the office of the blessing and distribution of palms was said, was utterly ignored by the reporters.

Speaking of "ritualistic," I have seen a reference to "an 'asperges' service in a spiritualistic church." This, I suppose, is another to the account of the compositor.

Did you ever hear of the "Girl's Friendless Society"? I have; there is a branch of it in a certain city of this diocese, according to a newspaper item.

At a diocesan convention there were said to be in attendance "the following clergymen and deacons." Hear that, ye deacons! Wherefore should you be thus summarily relegated to the ranks of the laity?

One of the statements best adapted to mystify a non-Churchman is the following: "The literary will be said at 10 o'clock Friday." Sometimes it appears in a somewhat more extended form, as "the literary service." Probably this is one of the additional services not allowed by the Prayer Book, but introduced by the benighted Ritualists. Even a Churchman, I think, might well be pardoned for failing to recognize the litany under such a disguise.

The following ludicrous combination appeared as a single line of an Easter programme: "Responsive reading, 'Gloria's Creed and Lord's Prayer'."

A local paper which prints each day a resume of historical events of that date, with the "holidays" falling thereon, had under the latter head on June 24th, "Saints Nativity of John the Baptist, Bartholomew." Where St. Bartholomew came in I have never been able to guess. An Associated Press dispatch once described a funeral as occurring in "Trinity Cathedral Episcopal Church."

In this city there are three vested choirs, two male and one mixed. The last has been called a "vestry choir," and one of the others, a "vestal choir." These may possibly be the reporter's; the third choir has also suffered, but undoubtedly at the hands of the compositor: "The boys' choir will meet this afternoon." It does seem a little singular that this should have been perpetrated just about the time of the introduction of the vested choir, an innovation vigorously opposed by some parishioners; it almost leads one to think it was meant to insinuate that it was something to "sit down on."

The elegant and impressive language in which our secular friend clothes his Church news is enough to make the Church editor "turn green with envy." For instance we read that a holy day has been observed "with appropriate exercises," that "all the bishops wore the full regalia of their office" (this from the telegraphic account of the consecration of the Bishop of Los Angeles), or that a marriage has been solemnized "according to the delightful form of the Episcopal Church." And read this: "A delightful service of song was held at Christ church last night. Some of the city's sweetest singers were in the choir, and the large congregation present was highly entertained." Will somebody kindly tell us what we go to church for, anyway?

The Roman Church fares no better than our own, as the following examples may serve to show. On Rogation Monday: "Rogation services will be held every night this week." On Ash Wednesday: "The celebrant with a hyssop marks the cross on the forehead" (referring to the ashes). I should think the sacred sign would be rather straggly and ill defined. On Good Friday, "The stations of the Cross to-night will terminate the exercises of the day. The Mass to-morrow will be preceded by the Baptism of catechisms." On Christmas: "At the Benedictus the 'Holy Knight' was beautifully rendered." On the eve of the Epiphany: "To-morrow the Feast of the Magic will be celebrated." Another is from a Washington paper: "The order of the pallium was conferred on Archbishop N. last week."

I have only one more specimen, but it serves as a fitting climax to the whole. It occurs in an article on what the writer—and I think every Churchman will agree with him—calls a "peculiar service" held in Valencia on Good Friday. "The priests kneel in silence while pestilential psalms are sung by a hidden choir."

LAICUS.

Book Reviews and Notices

A Thousand Days in the Arctic. By Frederick G. Jackson, Knight, etc. With preface by Admiral McClintock, R. N. Illustrated from photographs by the author and drawings. With original maps. New York: Harper & Brothers. $6.

This latest book on Arctic life and exploration deserves to rank among the first in general interest and scientific value. It is a splendid specimen of book-making, equal to anything that has appeared in this line. Mr. Jackson's expedition was organized by the generosity of a public-spirited Englishman, Alfred Harmsworth, for the exploration of Franz-Josef Land, and resulted in defining it as a number of islands, instead of an Arctic continent. Three years were passed by the party in the North, with headquarters within ten degrees of the Pole, and sledge journeys were made to points considerably north of this. The monotony of their life (and of Mr. Jackson's book) is relieved by the killing of bears and walrus, eighty-seven of the former being slaughtered. The value of ponies in sledging was first demonstrated in this expedition. They were found to be superior to dogs and reindeer. The most interesting event of the thousand days was the coming of Nansen and his companion over the ice and water from "Farthest North," of which Nansen has written so well. Jackson's description of this is the best thing in his book. His writing is rather dull, at times, and often inexcusably careless. A work of such dignity and importance should have had careful revision. We are frequently told the same things over again, almost in the same words. How many days the author spent in doing "a variety of odd jobs" it would be difficult to count. Indeed, the reader becomes tired of "odd jobs." "Chaps" does constant service as name for dogs and bears and companions. As for rhetorical style and elegance of diction, the author seems to have thrown them to the Arctic winds. "We have had," he says, page 299, "an exceedingly near squeak for it, and it was very nearly ta-ta on many occasions." That may do at dinner in the West End Club, but for a book of world-wide interest it is deplorable. "No one properly appreciates light until they have spent a winter or two," etc., p. 366. They could not keep the sheep longer, "as we require the hay they are eating for the pony." They "fetched in a load of dry moss for firing with 'Blackie' and a sledge, which we stacked on a flat rock behind the hut" (page 372). Mr. Jackson doubtless wrote better English than that before he left school. He might well have exerted himself to come as near to Nansen in the presentation of his work to the world, as he did in doing it.

We note in record of this expedition, as in that of Nansen's, scarcely any reference to religious thought, word, or act. The doctor, however, read the burial service at the grave of a sailor (not a member of the party). On the death of a favorite dog, Mr. Jackson writes: "May he and I meet again to continue our sport together in the next world, and may we bag many a good bear yet. Poor old chap!" Like Nansen's party, this one makes much of Christmas as a day of feasting, but never a Christian hymn or prayer, that we hear of. "We had our hair cut in honor of the occasion and a change of clothes." It is deplorable that picked men, the flower of our Christian civilization, more or less familiar with the Bible and the Prayer Book, should not have Christ in their Christmas, even by the mention of His name. So throughout the thousand days of danger and solitude, facing, sometimes, the grandest and most terrific aspects of nature, in gloom and splendor, there is the same lamentable absence of any reference to God and to the mysteries of time and eternity.

The maps and the appendix give one at a glance an idea of the great amount of geographical and scientific work done by the party, under the most difficult and trying conditions. For men not experienced in Arctic life, they accomplished wonders. Not a man had an hour's serious illness or was excused from duty during the three years.

A Brief Introduction to Modern Philosophy. By Arthur Kenyon Rogers, Ph.D. New York: The Macmillan Company. Price, $1.25.

The aim of this brief treatise is to open the way for the untrained mind to the understanding of the leading philosophies which have claimed the attention of mankind. These are given as follows: Dualism, Pantheism, and Theism; Materialism and Subjective Idealism; Rationalism and Sensationalism; Kant, Hegel, Agnosticism, Theistic Idealism. From a brief, but fair examination of these, the author shows that Theistic Idealism alone is an adequate explanation of reality. "The ultimate reality which constitutes the universe, is conceived after the analogy, at least, of a conscious life."

English Cathedrals Illustrated. By Francis Bond. One hundred and eighty illustrations from photographs. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott Company.

The study of English cathedrals is not confined to architects or experts in any profession. It is the pleasing pursuit of many who travel leisurely, and might, with advantage, engage the attention of many more. With such a guide as this convenient and compact book, the study is systematized and facilitated. It can hardly be said that any book makes the mastery of even one cathedral easy, but it is a great advantage to have before us the results of scholarly investigation, and suggestions which come from long observation and experience. The many illustrations in the volume before us are small and do not materially increase its bulk. It is not too large for use of the traveler.

Workers Together with God. A Series of Papers on Some of the Church's Works, by Some of the Church's Workers. Edited by Nathaniel Keymer, M.A., Rector of Headon, Notts; and a Canon Missioner in the Diocese of Southwell. Third edition. London: A. R. Mowbray & Co; New York: James Pott & Co. Pp. 378. Price, $1.75.

A rich and most useful volume of papers, sixty-seven in number, concerned with almost every possible department of Church work, we should say, in the most actively worked parish, and replete with the experienced counsel and wise, discriminating suggestions of representative clergy and other Church workers in England. We can earnestly commend this book as an invaluable acquisition for help and guidance to all workers in the American Church; and among these, specially to the parish clergy who take order and direction of all parochial activities in their cure. It were hard to imagine any varied phase of Church work that is here left untouched; it is an indispensable vade mecum for every path of Church life and parish duty.

Opinions of the Press

The Guardian (Eng.)

THE OPINION.—It is not, however, either our place or our intention to criticise the judgment. Our one desire is to do what in us lies to secure that it shall be obeyed. It might conceivably have been expressed in terms which would have made the duty of obedience one of great, perhaps of insufferable, difficulty. It might, for example, have appealed, not to the Prayer Book, but the interpretation placed on the Prayer Book by a civil court. It might have said—Archbishop Tait in the same circumstances certainly would have said—that in view of the decision of the Final Court of Appeals in ecclesiastical causes, the unlawfulness of incense must be taken as established. It might have said that incense symbolized this or that doctrine, and as this doctrine was unknown to the Church of England, any ceremony which set it forth is forbidden. All the nice casuistry which surrounds decisions based upon wrong reasons would thus have been brought into play, and the issue submitted to the clergy would not have been, as it is now, between obedience or disobedience to lawful authority, but between obedience or disobedience to lawful authority which had made itself the mere mouthpiece of a secular court, or sought unduly to limit the "liberty of prophesying" in the Church of England.

Church Review (Eng.)

ANOTHER OPINION.—If ever a conclusion was based on the narrowest principles of legal interpretation, it is the one before us. And yet in the course of his remarks the primate definitely declared that practices like the recitation of the General Thanksgiving by the whole congregation are illegal, "but no bishop would be so unwise as to sanction a prosecution on account of them." It would, therefore, appear that the primate, in calling upon the clergy to relinquish the use of incense, has done so, not on the ground of its illegality, but for reasons of "wisdom," or in other words, of expediency. The inference is irresistible from his grace's own words—words which must deprive a decision which never could have had spiritual or coercive authority of any moral weight it might otherwise have borne.

The Times (Eng.)

YET ANOTHER.—The real interest of this Archiepiscopal hearing and decision lies deeper than the comparatively uninteresting, not to say trivial, matters that have occasioned it. Will it be accepted and obeyed, if not by all, at least by the great majority of those clergy whose mistaken zeal has led them to adopt usages and ceremonies not allowed by the authority which they have solemnly promised to respect? . . . It is true that their decision has no legal force. No allusion, we may note, is made in it to any legal decisions by the courts or the Privy Council. The proceedings before them have been a hearing, not a trial; and the result is not a verdict or a judgment, but a decision. But it is a decision which ought to carry great moral weight; and it is hard to see how those who make a strong point of having spiritual matters tried only by spiritual persons, can refuse to recognize it.

The Church Eclectic

A SUMMING UP.—While, therefore, we think the opinion of the Archbishops' one that is untenable under a fair construction of the law, yet we are also of the opinion that the evil resulting from this opinion may be greatly overstated. To our mind the chief practical difficulty of the opinion is in the intense literalness, the narrow failure to adjust law to conditions, the failure to understand history, that are more annoying than the loss of incense and processional lights. These things cannot be condemned without carrying with them everything in the way of reverent usage not expressly mentioned in the Prayer Book, except those acts which undoubtedly fall under the head of gestures. The Archbishop takes care not to declare explicitly that omission is prohibition, but his opinion is tenable on no other theory. If every formal act is a ceremony, and every ceremony not expressly ordered is forbidden, then omission is prohibition. But if ceremonies forbidden are other complete rites when substituted for those of the Prayer Book, as for instance, the Sarum or Roman Mass, which were clearly in the minds of the framers of the prohibition—and every dictionary gives the preference to that definition of the term—then the prohibitions of the Acts of Uniformity have no bearing whatever on the details of administering the rites authorized.

The Household

A Cabin in the Woods

JOHN BURROUGHS, AS INTERVIEWED BY CLIFTON JOHNSON

FROM The Interior

A FEW years ago, John Burroughs bought a three-acre swamp back in the rough woodland near his home on the Hudson. Since then he has cut off the trees and brush, pulled up a good share of the stumps, dug drains, and the former swamp is now devoted to the raising of celery.

The work of reclaiming this wild land stirred the aboriginal instincts of our nature lover so that he presently found himself longing for a wigwam, or cabin, to which he might retire, when he was in the mood, and live a life of rude simplicity. This cabin is now a reality. Its beams, rafters, and supports are of logs with the bark on, and its outer walls are of bark-covered slabs nailed on horizontally, giving it a little the look of a log house. It stands on a shoulder of rock on the edge of the swamp. Rough, wooded ridges are all about, and the only connection it has with the outside world is by a rutted, irregular cart-path. The low roar of a distant water-fall comes pulsing through the air when the wind is right, and in the middle of the swamp a wonderfully distinct echo answers one from the near ledges. Other attractions of the spot are a spring of clear, cool water, and a cave that makes a good retreat on hot summer noons.

The house has a piazza, a cellar, and a roomy loft. Its inner walls are of planed boards, with the cracks between hidden by split birch saplings. All the planning and most of the work on the building are Mr. Burroughs' own. The chimney, in particular, is his handiwork, and he says there is no better one anywhere. It is at the end of the house, and shows all the way up on the outside. The stones of which it is built were picked up close about.

The first night that I spent at "Slabsides" was in March, and the weather was sharp and the ground still snow-covered. As soon as I stepped inside the door, in the dusk of my evening arrival, I was greeted by the pleasant woodsy smell of the birch which enters largely into the cabin architecture, and by the faint smoky odor of the fire blazing and crackling in the open fire-place. Mr. Burroughs at once began to get supper, setting certain things to warm before the fire, and conveying certain other things from a cupboard to the table. This table was a home-made work of art, but it had one lack—you could not get your knees under it. However, this defect has been remedied since.

After supper, we washed and wiped the dishes, threw the dish-water out the back door, and brushed off the table with the broom. Then we sat down before the fire, with a consciousness of duty well performed, and gave ourselves up to talk. The oil in the lamp ran low after a while, but that did not matter; we put out the light, and in the gloom the flames of the fire-place seemed cheerier than ever.

In a birch alcove was a bedstead built of small tree-trunks and slabs, and presently we put all freezeable things on the stone mantel over the fire and retired. I can not say what the time was, for we neither of us had watches. Mine, I had by chance left at home, and Mr. Burroughs did not own one.

He said he used to have a watch ten years ago, but he lost it one winter, and did not find it till the next spring. Meanwhile, a cart-wheel had run over it, and he did not take the trouble to get another. He did not much regret his loss, for it was a watch that had a habit of stopping once in awhile for three or four minutes, and then going on again. As a result, he often had to run to catch trains, and he supposed he had hurt his health and shortened his life by the exertion that watch caused him. He said he had not much use for a watch, anyway—he was always able to estimate the time from his inner consciousness, within a few minutes.

Mr. Burroughs affirmed that his cabin was a better one than the log house his grandfather built, or the log house built by anyone else's grandfather. Indeed, he thought if his grandfather were to appear and look over this abode of his he would reprove him for living too luxuriously. Nevertheless, the place was pretty frosty the next morning, and for a time, even after the fire was well started, our backs were chilled through, though our faces were perhaps at the same moment being baked. It seemed to me that if I were going to live the life of an early settler, I would prefer to skip the winters.

Since I first visited "Slabsides" it has been in many ways greatly improved. The stock of rustic furniture has increased, and the more the house is lived in, the more it gains in touches of coziness and home-likeness. Green vines climb the shaggy cedar posts of the piazza in summer, a garden flourishes on the borders of the celery patch, and a flock of hens pick sociably about in the house neighborhood. Of late, Mr. Burroughs has lived at "Slabsides" for months at a time. He prefers it to Riverby, his comfortable modern home, a mile and a half down the hill on the west shore of the Hudson. An older brother, a small dog, and nature, creeping in untamed wildness almost to his threshold, are his companions.

In the glimpses that I caught of this woodland abode and the bit of reclaimed swamp round about, and of its occupants' mode of living, there was something uncommonly fresh and free and interesting; and one spring evening, as we sat after supper watching the flickering firelight, I asked Mr. Burroughs what the pleasures of this sort of life were, and how he came to try it. His replies to my various queries I give as nearly as possible in his own words. He said:

"This place attracts me. The publicity of Riverby on the hillslope overlooking the Hudson, isn't congenial, and I feel more at home over here, with this great rock you see from the window reaching round my house like a protecting arm. There's nothing like having a snug nook or corner where one can live in retirement. Here, we have no yachts of millionaires flaunting up and down the river, no steamboats, no cars, no feeling that you are in the eye of all the world. The Hudson is a great highway. It hasn't the domestic and winning qualities that a smaller stream would have. Its commercial aspect is always intruding, and the dweller on its banks finds its disturbing sights and sounds continually jarring on his sensibilities.

"This having a mansion perched up on the heights suits many better than it does me. I think Americans have a liking for extreme publicity. But it is a great mistake. The top of a hill—the most ambitious place—is not the place for a home. It is too exposed, and there is such an absence of coziness and shelter. The English who build their homes in retired groves, show better taste.

"Some say to me: 'Why do you live back here in the woods when you have a nice place down there on the Hudson?' They can't understand why a man wants to get back to the simpler, ruder things of life. As for me, I expect, if I keep on growing in grace, I shall come to the point where I shall feel that a tent or a hut with one room is all I want. Perhaps that is going too far, but it is better than the other extreme, where a man can find nothing good enough for him, and must have a house of a hundred rooms, with fifty guest chambers.

"My ideal of a country dwelling is a low, rambling structure of stone, built without any reference whatever to outside people and passers-by. It should be made just to suit the comfort of the occupants. The looks can be left to take care of themselves; and after all, I think you would be surprised to find what good architectural effects you would get in that way. I would have broad roofs and plenty of windows, and make the rooms cheerful and nice with open fireplaces.

"What gives me most satisfaction in my place here is the land. It looks different from other land. It is land I made, and it is much more precious than any I could buy. Before I took hold of it there was nothing here in this hollow of the woods but a bit of rude nature, and my land was buried beneath trees, stumps, and bog. I had to fight for it, and it's real land you get that way. It looks to me like the money I got selling sugar-cakes when I was a boy—the only real money I've ever had. The way I earned it was this. Before we began work in the sugar bush, in the first warm days of spring, I would run up to the woods and tap four or five trees, lug the sap down regularly, and, amid the protests of the women folks, make a place for a kettle full on the kitchen stove. Finally I'd have a sugaring-off, and mould the sugar into little scalloped cakes, that I would peddle in the village at two cents apiece.

"That money had value no money has had since. Money I get now doesn't stick to my fingers as that did. Oh, I'd give anything for some more of it! I know I had three dollars in silver quarters one spring, and I was the envy of every boy in town. I had charm; I had power. I would carry it a month or two, till the novelty wore off, before I would begin to spend it. I bought my first grammar, first algebra, and other school books, with my sugar-money.

"It is wonderful money that one earns in boyhood that way. It is the same with my swamp here. This is wonderful land—land I have created myself. If some one had given me a nice piece of tillable land, I wouldn't have thought anything of it, as compared with this. I'd always wanted to own some sort of place in the woods. For years, I'd been dicker with a man way back in the Catskills. I wanted to put up a log or stone house there, but he couldn't give me a clear title to the land. It was a glen among the mountains. I was attracted by the purity of the elements there—they were purer than in any other valley in the world. It was a spot untouched by man; water perfect, air perfect, seclusion perfect—couldn't be beat anywhere. The brook that flowed through the woods over the washed stones was absolutely clean; and there were mountains on all sides—a great brotherhood of them joining hands and circling about you.

"But my surroundings here are a little savager than they would be in that Catskill valley. There, everything is covered with verdure and trees. Here we are hemmed in by rocks and rugged cliffs. Of course there are places in the Catskills where the rocks frown on you. But I have here a rare combination—you jump at once from beetling crag right down to garden mould; and, though I miss the great trees, this soil, the slow accretion of ages, is to me very suggestive and impressive.

"Some of my friends are troubled because I call my cabin 'Slabsides.' Most people imagine the name is a joke. Those who think I really have named it 'Slabsides' protest. They say such a term is too slangy—too rough. But there is nothing disagreeable or unpoetic about a slab, and the house is made of slabs, and why shouldn't it take its name from them? I couldn't give it a pretty name, like Rock Haven or Echo Lodge. Cragfoot has been suggested, and that isn't bad—still, it's a little bit too pretentious. But give a place like this an ugly name and it always sticks. That's an advantage—and after a time the crudeness wears away, and it comes to have some other association. If I could have gotten a good birch name I would have liked it, but nothing exactly suitable occurred to me. There's a good flavor about birch. I felt the birch when I was young. I've had a sentiment of attachment for it ever since.

"I have been staying up here now for several months—ever since the first mild weather of March. I had the grippe when I came, but the air and water and simple living have cured me. Every day I go down to the village for my mail and, before I return, I spend an hour or two at Riverby to keep track of things there. I always walk back and forth. I don't keep a horse, though I have at times in the past. It's too much trouble. I like a horse if some one else drives and takes care of him. I think I was made to be a gentleman. Looking after a horse is not to my taste. Cleaning him, for instance, simply transfers the dirt from the horse to you, and the horsey smell hangs about you for a week.

"I undertook to mop here a few weeks ago. It was a new experience, and not altogether a success. I left a good deal of the candle wicking that the mop was made of, sticking in the slivers of the floor. First, I rubbed soap on the grease spots, then poured on hot water, then sozzled the mop up and down in the water, and afterwards wrung it out dry into a pail. Lastly I sopped up the moisture that remained, just as I had seen my mother do, long ago.

"As you mop, you don't want to walk on the floor you have cleaned; but I got myself in a corner once and couldn't retreat. That was poor tactics—poor housewifery. When you keep house yourself you come to appreciate these little points of management by which you come out right. I shall know better next time—if there ever is a next time. That mopping was a good deal like the experience I had at Riverby in making a cherry pudding once when my wife was away. I'd seen her do it a good many times. She used canned cherries, and cooked them with a crust on top. I poured my cherries in, and then stirred up the dough all right (though I did get my hands badly stuck up), till it came to putting the dough in place for a crust. I couldn't make it float. I got so I could handle it pretty well, but I no sooner let go of it than it plunged down into the cherry juice out of sight. I tried again and again. I had the science of the thing correct enough, but I hadn't the art. Finally I gave it up, and baked it as it was, with the crust somewhere down in the juice. The cherries turned out first rate, but the crust was a mess that a dog couldn't eat. I do things very much simpler here at Slabsides. If I want a cherry pudding now, I soak some crackers, put the cherries on them, and there I have my pudding. The crackers do for crust, and it tastes very good.

"But brother and I don't spend much time over housework here in the woods. We study to economize labor. There's two wooden plates we use. They are good for about two meals, and then we throw them in the fire. To be sure, they are thin and rather wobbly, and if you put anything wet on them they warp a little before we get done eating; still they serve very well.

"When I first began life here I used to eat my dinner with a newspaper for a tablecloth, but I keep making improvements. You see, my table now is covered with a light oilcloth. I got it light on purpose, so that I'd feel compelled to keep it clean, for the sake of appearances, if for nothing else. There's an immense saving in this sort of living. I don't have to go through any doors to get my victuals to the dining-room, as would be the case in most houses. No, I can get my steak or chop from the coals to the table in two jumps.

"My mornings I usually spend indoors, reading, writing, and thinking. About eleven o'clock I put my potatoes cooking, and at twelve I broil my meat and set on the dinner. If, instead of meat and potatoes, I'm going to have beans, I start them at eight o'clock; and while I bake my intellectual beans, my other beans are sizzling and ripening in the pot. Yes, sir! I can live here like a philosopher.

"When a stranger or a friend comes to call, and I see he is going to stay to dinner, I slyly slip an extra potato in the ashes and go on with the conversation. By and by I step out to the spring where we have our larder sunken in the cold water, get a shad, or a steak, or chop, and have dinner ready before the caller knows what has happened. A great many people come to see me; some by appointment, some without warning; some old friends, some strangers I've never met or heard of. The young people from the village are often over to picnic with me, and if celery is in season, I go out and bring in an armful, and we have a celery feast.

"Pelicantown"

WHY is it that all the eve-swallows in a village place their row of mud tenements under the roof of a certain barn? Every nook in which a nest could be built is occupied by the clay apartments—not one is "to let"; still, none of the birds seem to think of building under the equally favorable roof of the neighboring barn. Their cousins, the bank-swallows, show the same strong sociability, and from miles around they gather to nest in some particular sand bank, the face of which will be thickly pitted with the entrances to their burrows.

It is not because the place chosen is the only one available that the birds nest in flocks. There may be hundreds of barns and banks just as good as the one selected. It is not a question of food, for insects are abundant everywhere, and these strong-flying birds can hunt them over miles of country. It is not because they find "safety in numbers"; rather do they make themselves conspicuous by gathering in such large bodies. As a rule, it is sociability—the desire for companionship—that offers the only reasonable explanation for the great colonies which may be observed at nesting time.

Certainly no other theory will explain the origin of Pelicantown. Its site, like those often selected by human colonists, seems poorly chosen; its natural advantages are few; but so attached to their home are its inhabitants that even the most cruel persecution by their human foes has failed to drive them from the land of their ancestors.

But where is Pelicantown? In spite of its population of nearly three thousand, few maps will show it. Glance with me, therefore, at a map of Florida. Find the Indian River, that long, narrow lagoon on its east coast, divided from the sea by only a ribbon of land. Pelicantown is situated about midway between its northern and southern extremities, near the eastern shore of a bay which here makes the river about three miles wide. It is an island, triangular in shape, containing about three acres of ground. A few bushes and low palm trees grow on it, and there are great patches of tangled grass, but at least one-fourth of its surface is bare sand.

During the nesting season, this barren island is the home of probably all the pelicans of Indian River. Here they come to build their nests, lay their eggs, and rear their young, and from January to May, life in Pelicantown presents many novel scenes and picturesque incidents.

In March, 1898, I visited this city of birds. As my boat approached, I saw signs of life. Files of birds were returning from fishing expeditions; platoons were resting on the sandy points; some were in bathing, others were sailing about in broad circles high overhead; and soon one could hear the sound of many voices—a medley of strange cries in an unknown tongue.

It being quite impossible to count the birds, I determined to count their nests, of which my census showed there were no less than 845; but only 251 were occupied, though all had been built that spring.

The death rate is high in Pelicantown. Doubtless many young birds die through injuries received while trying to escape from tourists who visit the island and thoughtlessly chase the young birds about. Eggs and very young birds are destroyed in hundreds by fish-crows, that daily come over from the mainland on marauding expeditions. It is not probable, therefore, that in many families three young pelicans live to leave the nest together; hence we may reckon about one and a half pelican to each of the deserted nests. Add to these two parent pelicans to each nest, and we have 2,581 birds on the wing or on foot. But this number is to be increased by the 154 young that were still in the nests, making the total population of Pelicantown 2,735.

This calculation, however, does not take into account the eggs found, from which almost hourly come new inhabitants of the island; and it is with these eggs, or rather in what they are placed, that we may begin our study of a pelican's life.—St. Nicholas.

THE sight of a row of forceps has closed the mouths of many sufferers, even after they had seated themselves in the dentist's chair. Dental surgeons anticipate this, and the following amusing instance of how an obstinate Irishman was made to show his teeth may not be amiss.

Pat came to the dentist's with his jaw very much swollen from a tooth he desired to have pulled. But when the suffering son of Erin got into the dentist's chair and saw the gleaming pair of forceps approaching his face, he positively refused to open his mouth.

The dentist quietly told his page-boy to prick his patient with a pin, and when Pat opened his mouth to yell, the dentist seized the tooth, and out it came.

"It didn't hurt as much as you expected it would, did it?" the dentist asked, smiling.

"Well, no," replied Pat, hesitatingly, as if doubting the truthfulness of his admission. "But," he added, placing his hand on the spot where the boy pricked him with the pin, "begorra, little did I think the roots would reach down like that."—Tit-Bits.

Sermons in Flowers

BY F. L. NORTHRUP

A handful of brave little daisies
Have preached us a sermon to-day
That I think we shall all remember
Long after they've faded away.

We gathered them out in the sunshine,
Of which they seemed almost a part,
So deep had they drunk in its richness,
These flowers of the golden heart!

And little, hot, eager hands held them,
And clasped them perhaps "over tight,"
Till the long home journey was ended,
With the drooping down of the night.

Then the children's poor faded treasures
Brought a tender, regretful sigh
That they were not left in their freshness
Out under their own bright sky.

But behold the wonder! This morning
Each face was upturned to the light,
And some one said for a fancy,
"They look like the choir-boys in white."

"We will call them our preachers," said mother,
"And I believe this is their text:
'Wherever the Lord's hand has put you,
Do bravely the thing that lies next."

"Don't droop your head, tired and discouraged,
If there's ever a spring to be found;
There's no time for useless complaining,
For duties lie close all around.

"Try instead to be cheery and helpful
When things go all criss-cross and wrong,
To nod with a smile to your neighbors,
Or brighten your work with a song

"So gather God's sunshine and whiteness
Into your lives, and each day
Drink from His wells of refreshing
New strength for the hot, dusty way."

Elephants as Scholars

"SCORES of people ask me every day," said Keeper Snyder of the elephant-house in Central Park, recently, "How anything so stupid-looking and thick-skinned as an elephant can be taught anything. I tell them all that elephants are not unlike children. Some are too dull to learn anything, and others catch an idea quickly.

"Tom," he went on, pointing to the large elephant who was busily engaged in throwing hay on his back, "although irascible in disposition, is quite intelligent. The first trick I taught him was to lie down. This was not so easy to accomplish as it might seem, for it took a block-and-fall at front and rear, with a gang of fifteen or twenty men at each end. I stood at one side, and as I said 'get down,' his feet were drawn out from under him. This had to be repeated only a few times, before he learned what 'get down' meant for him.

"To teach him to stand on his hind feet, and on his head, a block-and-fall on a beam over his head, a snatch-block and two 'dead-men' in the floor, and the services of another elephant were, all required. As I said, 'get up,' the elephant in harness walked forward and Tom's front feet went up, while his hind feet were chained together. When I said 'stand on your head,' his front feet, which had been previously chained, remained on the floor, while his hind feet were drawn up until they almost literally 'kicked the beam.'

"These were his first lessons. When he learned to drill, to 'right-about-face,' and

'left-about-face,' I stood on one side of him, and another man on the other, and we each had a prod. As I commanded 'right-about-face,' he was pushed over to the right, and 'left-about-face,' he was prodded in that direction. I taught him to waltz in much the same way, only, as we pushed him back and forth we made him go clear around, and now he is one of the best waltzers in the country. He learned to ring the bell and fan himself in one lesson. Both require the same motion, and they are really the same trick, although people never think of that. Yes, he knows which is which, and never picks up the fan or napkin when I tell him to ring the bell. I only had to put each, one at a time, in his trunk; and with the fan and bell I shook it, and with the napkin wiped first one side of his mouth and then the other. He took to hand-organ grinding like a Mulberry street Italian. It is one of his favorite tricks.

"The elephant is the only animal whose legs all bend the same way. His hind legs bend in, and the position required for creeping is not very comfortable, but he does it as well as a baby. His performances on the harmonica are the most surprising to on-lookers, but the fact is, that all the intelligence required for that is holding the instrument. As he must breathe through his trunk, every breath moves it back and forth. I discovered that he holds his breath when he stands on his hind legs, by trying to get him to do that and play the harmonica at the same time; but his front feet are no sooner up than the sound ceases until they are down again.

"His tub is about two-and-a-half feet high, and it took me about an hour to get him to mount it the first time, and as long to get him down from it once he was up. I had finally to improvise a step from it before he would come down. He went right up again, however, and came down, and repeated the movement several times in the first lesson. Now he mounts it and stands on his hind feet, his front feet, his side feet, and waltzes and charges on it.

"People all seem to think that an elephant has no sense of feeling, because his skin is thick and coarse. The fact is that his skin is as sensitive as a baby's, and if you tickle him with a straw, you will find it out. The flies and mosquitoes are great disturbers of his peace, and he is tossing hay on his back now to dislodge them.

"Tom had his annual bath and oiling a few days ago, and the latter operation prevents his skin from getting too dry. In his native state he treats himself to mud baths and keeps himself in condition.

"The feet of the elephant have to be repaired frequently, for they are as susceptible to corns and stone-bruises as the feet of people, and they have to be cut and trimmed.

You wouldn't think it, would you, that twice around Tom's front foot when he is standing with his full weight upon it, is equal to his height. It is true, and it is a rule that it seldom varies an inch in any elephant.

"The African elephants have only four toes and their ears are very large. The Asiatic elephants have five toes, and their ears are smaller. There are few African elephants in this country, not more than three or four. Not long ago, at an exhibition in this city, there was a skin of leather with small ears and comparatively fine texture (the hide from all elephants has too large pores to make it of use), and it was labeled 'hide from an African elephant.' People don't know anything about them."

As Mr. Snyder said this, he walked to the cage of the third occupant of the elephant house, where the two-horned rhinoceros stood in the opposite corner, looking stolidly in the opposite direction.

"Come here, Boo," he said kindly; and slowly but promptly the stupid looking animal turned and walked up to her keeper, putting her pointed lip through the bars on to his hand. "Open your mouth," he said. "No, open it wider—wider," and after repeated efforts it was opened wide enough to display the two perfectly shaped tongues, one above the other. "Whether this is a characteristic of the two-horned rhinoceros, I do not know," Mr. Snyder said, "because this is the only one in captivity. The only one that has been captured."

"Her strength lies in her huge neck, and her front horn is for stabbing and the back one for tearing. She can be as quick as a cat, and is the most valuable and most ferocious animal in the Zoo. Her eyes are so placed, however, that she can only look straight ahead, and not up or down. When food is placed before her on the ground, she cannot see it, but feels for it. She has to be oiled once a month. She is a beauty," said Mr. Snyder, "but I admit that the dent which involves the largest part of her head doesn't leave much room for brains."

"All of the animals seem to have very long memories," said Mr. Smith who is in charge of the menagerie. "One of the tigresses took a dislike the day she came, which was several years ago, to one of the keepers, and every time she has seen him since, she has spit and snarled and sprung at the bars in an effort to get at him. She knows him in a crowd, and even if I am inside the rail, scratching her as she likes to have me, the moment she catches sight of him she is enraged."

About ten thousand people visit the menagerie every day, and there are frequently as many as sixty thousand on pleasant holidays. "The people enjoy it," said Mr. Smith "more than any other institution in the city." The attendance at the Metropolitan Museum of Art seldom averages over three thousand a day.—CARRIE D. MC-COMBER in N. Y. Post.

TOGETHER with the new recruits for the Philippine campaign, several shiploads of cavalry horses are now on their way to Manila. It is a source of wonder to many persons how cavalry horses are trained to become accustomed to fire and military life in general. Each horse for our cavalry service costs the War Department about sixty-five dollars in the initial stage. This is what the government paid for the unbroken bronchos that were acquired for the Rough Riders last year, and the enormity of this price was one of the standing jokes among the cowboys and horsy men who served in the ranks under Wood and Roosevelt. The real value of the mounts was determined later at the government auction sales next autumn, when most of the horses were sold under the hammer for bids ranging from five dollars to seventy dollars. The average price fetched was twenty-five dollars, but even this was paid for sentimental reasons rather than for the actual quality of the horse-flesh. As a rule, though, most of the horses secured for the regular cavalry are worth their full price, and are apt to advance in value as they continue in service. Mares and stallions are barred. After a horse has been accepted for the service, it is branded with the letters U. S., and has the same initials carved into one forward hoof. Then it is broken to the saddle at one of the government riding schools.

The most trying part comes when the horse has to make its first acquaintance with fire. However easy it has been to train up to this point, every horse is frightened when guns begin to go off. One plan is to strap the animal to a plank and fire revolver shots near its head, accompanied by the rattle of tins.—Collier's Weekly.

"Gradually I noticed an uncomfortable feeling in the stomach, and more or less constipation. In a few months I began to lie awake at night long after I had retired.

"This increased, until I never thought of going to sleep before three or four o'clock in the morning, and then only after getting out of bed and walking the floor for an hour.

"I was talking of my nervous state with a friend, who suggested that perhaps it was the coffee I had been using. She felt quite sure it was, and stated that coffee would not stay on her stomach at all, but as she felt she must have a hot drink for breakfast, she had been using Postum Food Coffee. She said she didn't like Postum particularly well, and at breakfast the next morning I didn't wonder, when I tasted the flat drink that the servant brought on.

"The same day I was invited to take dinner with another friend, Mrs. Foster. I had visited her often before and knew she made delicious coffee, so when she asked how I liked her coffee, said, 'It is just as fine as usual.' She invited me to have another cup, but I said, 'I would not dare to take the second.' 'Oh, you can drink as many cups of of this as you like; it won't hurt you. This is Postum Food Coffee. We have been using it a year now, and the little children have all they want, and our family have never been as healthy as in the past year.' 'Postum,' said I, doubtfully, 'why, the Postum I had this morning didn't taste any more like this than dish water.' 'Perhaps it was not made right,' said my friend, 'I have known more than one person to be turned away from Postum because it was poorly made. There is no secret in it; only allow it to boil long enough to bring out the taste, and there you are.' I have been using Postum since, and am entirely cured of my trouble. I cannot say too much for it."

AN EVIDENCE OF PROSPERITY.

It is generally conceded by economists who study the commercial situation of the country, that the great arteries of railway travel are a sure indication of its condition. A depression in commercial lines means abandoned business trips and the cancellation of pleasure travel, while a healthy condition of affairs means business trips and an increase of passengers on pleasure bent.

A good evidence that a business revival has gone broadcast over this country is the "Lake Shore Limited," the star train of the Vanderbilt system, between New York and Chicago, which is daily comfortably filled. With a view to taking the best possible care of its patrons, the New York Central has arranged to increase the equipment of this train by placing an additional standard sleeper on the trains every day. To the regular traveler the appointments and comforts of this train are well known, but if you have never made a trip on it, you owe it to yourself to see and enjoy the advance made in comfort and luxury in modern railway travel. Remember the fare is no higher on this train, except between New York and Chicago, while the accommodations and service place this particular train conspicuously at the head of the list, when compared with other lines.—Albany Journal.

Finance and Commerce

In times like the present, when the tendency is without a ripple of reaction, each week is but a repetition of the previous week. Demand for all kinds of commodities in season is good, and, as a rule, prices are firm. Raw cotton, wheat and provisions are about the only exceptions. In cotton and wheat prices drag a little, because of dull speculative conditions, and provisions are easier because of another outbreak of yellow fever, though why a few cases of yellow fever should be a reason for selling provisions no man can tell. Years ago, yellow fever came along just at a time when the south was heavily long of hog products in the market in a speculative way, and not on a very legitimate basis. Disaster to them resulted, and since then, at the appearance of the fever, people sell provisions. It is a scare-crow the trade has set up for itself, and although all know it to be a scare crow, each pretends to think the others don't know it, and the whole flock gets off together.

The demand for provisions is good, and yellow fever is not likely to decrease it, while stocks are only moderate. Just at the moment owners of railway shares, enthusiastic newspaper writers, and that large and vague assemblage called the "public generally," with whom it "never rains but it pours," are whooping it up over the tremendous corn crop, which they say "is now practically assured."

Four or five months ago they were doing the same thing over the winter wheat prospects. They kept it up for weeks after we had repeatedly warned our readers that the winter wheat crop east of the Rocky Mountains was one of the worst failures on record. Later, the spring wheat crop was to be the salvation of the country—acreage large and condition perfect, etc. The facts are being demonstrated as we said—acreage 5 to 15 per cent. under last year's yield, poor in quantity and quality; crop at least 40,000,000 bushels under last year. Now the government estimates the corn crops at about 2,150,000,000 bushels, and the newspapers, not to be outdone, place it at 2,300,000,000. In our judgment, both these estimates are too high. There is a large acreage of corn, but it was mostly planted under unfavorable conditions, much of it late; it is notoriously uneven and spotted, the heat and drought of August has materially lessened the yield, and on the whole, we consider it perfectly safe to say that the crop will not now, in any event, exceed 2,000,000,000 bushels. Much of it is not yet out of the way of the frost. Two billion of corn is a big crop, but the old corn is well exhausted, and on account of droughts and poor pasturage over a wide area, and the high price of hay, consumption is, and is likely to continue, enormous. The last New York bank statement is again decidedly unfavorable.

South African Trade

THE increased public interest in affairs in Africa, and especially South Africa, resulting from recent developments, lends interest to some statements just prepared by the Treasury Bureau of Statistics relative to the commerce of the United States with that continent, and the growing demand in all its divisions for our manufactures and products. Exports from the United States to Africa were, in the fiscal year 1899, more than five times as great as they were in 1889. The total exports from the United States to all Africa in the fiscal year 1889, were but $3,496,505, and in 1899, they were $18,594,424. From Cape to Cairo and from Liberia to Abyssinia, American manufactures and American foodstuffs are making their way. Railroad bridges in the Nile valley, mining machinery in the gold and diamond districts, clothing and foodstuffs in the Soudan, all find an increasing demand. Exports from the United States to Africa have grown more rapidly since 1893 than those to any other of the grand divisions of the world, while Asia and Oceanica come next, Europe next, North America next, and South America last in the list showing the relative growth in our exports. To Africa, the increase from 1893 to 1899 is 218 per cent; to Asia and Oceanica, 185 per cent; to Europe, 42 per cent; to North America, 32 per cent, and to South America, 10 per cent., while the increase in the grand total during that period, has been in round terms, 45 per cent. Manufactured articles form the bulk of our exportations to Africa, and even in those articles ordinarily grouped under the title of breadstuffs and provisions, they are classes which have been so far advanced to a condition for immediate use, that practically all the labor required in their preparation as well as production, is included in the prices received for them when they are put into the market. Flour, meats, lard, tobacco, mineral oils, clothing, machinery, furniture, materials for railways, materials for mining industries, and agricultural implements form the large proportion of our exports to Africa, and in all of these the quantity and value of our exports are constantly increasing.

Not only are our exports to Africa rapidly growing, but they are evidently taking the place, to a greater or less extent, of those articles formerly supplied by other countries. The British South African Export Gazette, in a recent number, calls attention to the fact that imports into British and Portuguese Africa from the United States are rapidly growing, and that the increase from 1892-3 to 1897-8 was 281 per cent; in articles competing with British goods the increase was 140 per cent., and in non-competing articles, 565 per cent. Commenting upon this subject, it says:

"The great significance of the competitive items of the table is that a general entry has been made into a hitherto English market, and the progress which has been made, shown by the aggregate percental increase of 139.2 per cent. in the five years, is of a nature to challenge most serious attention."

The Washing of Flannels

IN the first place, flannels are always to be treated by themselves. They are not to be washed in the manner laid down for the cleansing of cottons, as such a course would simply spoil them. It is also very desirable that a dry-bright day be used, so that as soon as washed the woolen articles may be hung out in the clear air and quickly dried. For these reasons, especially in cold weather, it is not desirable to get the washing on the line too soon. The warm hours of noontime are the best for putting out the flannels.

Flannels are not to be boiled; they are not to be soaked before washing; they are not to be needlessly left in the water during any part of the process; they are not to be washed in suds which has been used for other goods, or dirty water of any kind; they are not to be subjected to the action of soda or any other strong chemical.

Clean, soft water is indispensable; if the family supply should, unfortunately, happen to be hard water, it should be softened before washing is attempted. For this purpose, as has already been said, nothing is better than lye made from wood ashes; but wood ashes are not to be had in every home. In their absence, ammonia makes a very good substitute, and should be added in sufficient quantities to soften the water. No harm is done if more be added than is actually needed, especially for white flannels, as it is helpful in the cleansing of the goods. Borax is also satisfactory for softening the water, and either that or ammonia may be added to the suds to aid the work of the soap. A tablespoonful of borax or of liquid ammonia to two gallons of water will be about the right proportion.

The water which is to be used for the suds and that for rinsing should be of as nearly the same temperature as possible, and not hotter than will allow the hands to be borne in it. A greater temperature will have a tendency to fix any dirt stains which may exist, while too low a degree of warmth will hardly give the thorough treatment desired. The suds should be prepared by dissolving a good quality of soap and stirring it thoroughly into the water, and soap should never be rubbed directly upon the flannel in any stage of the washing. If it is to be applied in any manner in greater strength than comes from the suds, it should be rubbed upon the palms of the hands and then upon the goods. The washboard is not to be used; and the wringer should be run with light pressure, though that method of extracting water from the cloth is less harmful than twisting the clothes. A single article should be immersed in the suds, rubbed gently between the hands, soured and drawn through the water, till it is cleared of dirt and stain; then lightly wrung and passed at once to the rinsing water, which is of the same temperature. As soon as all traces of the suds have been removed, it is to be wrung out, as gently as possible, shaken vigorously, and immediately hung up to dry. There should be no cooling between the two waters, and the entire process for each piece, from the beginning of the wash to the finish, ought to be as brief as possible. If this method is followed, the flannels will be pleasing in appearance, texture, and color. Where it is practicable, the use of a second suds, before the final rinsing water, is recommended.—Good Housekeeping.

M. Tissot spent 10 years, much of this time in Palestine, painting the originals from which the hundreds of illustrations in his work were made.

These 500 pictures tell the entire story of Christ's Life as it has never before been pictured.

The preparation and publishing took four years.

An investment of over $400,000 was made before the work was ready for delivery.

Notes of the World's Progress

A POLITICAL CONVENTION WAS held in Kentucky the other day, and certain sentiments which were given utterance do not augur a peaceful and harmonious campaign. In fact, if threats made are carried out, a good-sized insurrection might develop. Some hot-heads among the Republicans, who by no means represent that political organization in the State, plainly indicated their intention of hanging a few election inspectors if unfair methods were resorted to. When the question of franchise in the South is being debated, an impartial observer may well wonder if the lawless white man, whose favorite diversion is a lynching or white-cap party, is any more qualified to cast a ballot and exercise other prerogatives of American citizenship than the ignorant negro who is the central figure in one of the afore-mentioned diversions. Respect for laws is one of the first duties of citizenship.

— x —

WARFARE ON MORMONS IN THE South goes along merrily, and despite repeated invitations to leave, Mormon elders are conducting a vigorous campaign for converts. In a little Virginia town the other day Vigilants soundly thrashed two preachers, for which offense they were arrested and brought to trial. While court was in session and the trial in progress, friends of the prisoners gathered in force, took possession of the court, and proceeded with the case. The prisoners were acquitted, and the Mormon complainants compelled to pay costs of the trial. The Mormon Bishop having jurisdiction in the section has made representations to the proper authorities, demanding that the law breakers be punished. While there is little sympathy for followers of Brigham Young, there is, nevertheless, a feeling that antagonism to their teachings should not assume a form of violence.

— x —

CLAY COUNTY, KENTUCKY, IS MAKING undesirable history, owing to another outbreak of the Philpot-Griffith feud. Members and adherents of the two families have entered upon a war of extermination which the authorities seem unable to quell, as most of the deputy sheriffs are partisans. If there be militia enough in the State of Kentucky to put an end to this disgraceful game of murder, it should be stopped; if not, the government should take a hand. Usurpations of the law, punishing crimes which the law should punish, and thus prolonging bloodshed, do not add to the reputation of a State famous for chivalry and hospitality.

ANOTHER SOCIETY FLUTTER HAS been occasioned by a forthcoming international marriage, this time between a Russian prince and the grand-daughter of General Grant. A strange feature of such an alliance is the light in which it is looked upon by a large percentage of the class known as society. Tuft hunters may consider as a condescension the action of a titled foreigner in marrying an American girl, but certainly such an impression is not general. No man, no matter what his title may be, can confer any special honor upon a refined American woman by asking her hand in marriage, and in the present instance it may be added that as the grand-daughter of one of the three great generals of the century, a President of the United States, and as such the peer of any monarch on earth, Miss Grant cannot possibly receive an honor greater than is hers by birthright.

— x —

OUTSIDE IMMEDIATE SPHERES OF British influence, there exists a strong feeling of sympathy with the Boers in the present controversy with England. Having thrice removed from a section where British influence became dominant, the Boers naturally feel they have a right to maintain complete independence, a condition which England does not, and her statesmen say will not, concede. If the Boers were to extend without restriction the right of franchise to all foreigners in the Transvaal, it would not be long before the Transvaal would become a British possession, as the Boers are outnumbered three to one. Mining interests and other branches of commerce are already practically controlled by English capital. It is estimated that mines in the Transvaal will produce five hundred million pounds sterling. Present indications are that war will be averted, although the Boers are making most complete preparations to resist the demands of England. Whatever troops have so far been dispatched by England to South Africa number no more than would be needed under ordinary conditions.

— x —

HEREAFTER DEVOTEES OF AMATEUR photography will press the button and the kodak paper trust will do the rest. Manufacturers of Aristo, Solio, and other photographic print papers, have formed a trust and advanced prices from fifteen to one hundred per cent. From all accounts, this is not a top-heavy, water-logged affair, but the simon pure trust article warranted to hold together or money refunded. In preparing photographic paper, a white clay peculiar to certain sections of Germany is used, and as the entire supply of this is controlled by the trust, outside manufacturers must go into the combination or go out of business as soon as their supply of this particular ingredient is exhausted. It is the formation of trusts to raise prices which furnish the best ammunition to those who are combatting concentration of capital.

UNION LABOR MAY HAVE TO BE reckoned with before the corner-stone of the new Chicago federal building is laid. This is to be one of the principal events of the Fall Festival in October. There has been more or less trouble between contractors and laborers, owing to the claim that granite for the building, which is quarried in Vermont, is not being worked by union labor, hence the complications. If a non-union corner-stone is laid, organized labor will work against the success of the function, refuse to participate in the parade on the occasion, and display other manifestations of ill-will. If the contractors compromise the matter by having a union corner-stone, the labor tangle will not be straightened out because President McKinley who is to officiate at the ceremony, is not a member of a union, hence the proceeding would be irregular. It is now proposed to make the President a member of Brick-layers and Stone-masons' Union, No 21, and thus everybody will be satisfied.

CVILIZED NATIONS POINT THE finger of scorn at France. With innocence clearly established, Captain Alfred Dreyfus has been found guilty a second time by a court-martial on the charge of treason, and sentenced to ten years' imprisonment. The verdict was not entirely unexpected, as the attitude of his judges throughout the trial has been hostile, revealing a foregone determination to uphold the so-called honor of the General Staff, even though an innocent man be made to suffer. Steps have already been taken by friends of the prisoner to secure revision, but the outcome is problematical. It is a sad day for France when infamy takes the place of honor, when justice is perverted to cloak the crimes of corrupt officials. But the end is not yet. There are honorable men in France who will raise their voices in protest against the vicious verdict of the court-martial, who will for love of mother country endeavor to remove a foul blot from her escutcheon. This may lead to revolution, but better this than a compromise with dishonor.

WERE DREYFUS NOT A JEW, there would probably have been no Dreyfus case. Race prejudice seems to have been the incentive of the conspiracy against him, and hatred of Jews seems to blind the mass of Frenchmen to the injustice done him. Those who are not possessed of a high sense of honor appear to accept the verdict with satisfaction. Had he been declared innocent, anti-Semitic feeling, coupled with a desire to vindicate the "honor" of the army, would likely have resulted in an attempt to overthrow the government and establish a military dictatorship. Newspapers of England and Germany, and even Russia, a country in which a Jew has little standing, condemn in strongest terms the French caricature of justice. The world will watch with interest developments of the next few months. Nothing can now be a surprise.

The News of the Church

Death of Bishop Pierce

The State and diocese of Arkansas were profoundly shocked, Tuesday, the 5th inst., when the news was spread abroad that "Bishop Pierce was dead." Although the venerable Prelate had been ill for some weeks, yet the end was not expected, as his general health had so improved during the past year that he was able to perform his official duty better than for years. The end came at the rectory of St. Paul's, Fayetteville, Ark., where the Bishop had gone to officiate during the absence of the rector on a much-needed vacation. As in life, so in death, he was helping others.

The Rt. Rev. Henry Niles Pierce, D.D., LL.D., the fourth Bishop of the missionary jurisdiction of Arkansas and Indian Territory, and the first Diocesan of Arkansas, and the 95th in the American succession, was born Oct. 20, 1820, at Pawtucket, R. I. In 1842 he graduated with high honors from Brown University. He was ordered to the diaconate in 1848, and to the priesthood the following year. In 1862 he received the degree of D.D. from the University of Alabama, and LL.D. from William and Mary College; also D.D. from the University of the South, in 1869. He worked in the following fields; viz.: Missionary in Washington Co., Tex., 1849-'52; rector of Christ church, Matagorda, Tex., 1852-'54; Trinity church, New Orleans, 1854-'55; St. Paul's church, Rahway, N. J., 1855-'57; St. John's church, Mobile, Ala., 1857-'68, and St. Paul's church, Springfield, Ill., 1868-'70. He was consecrated Bishop of Arkansas and Indian Territory in 1870, by Bishops Green, of Mississippi; Whitehouse, of Illinois; Wilmer, of Alabama; Quintard, of Tennessee; Wilmer, of Louisiana, and Young, of Florida.

When the Bishop took charge of his new work he entered upon a life of hardship, self-sacrifice, and unrelenting toil. It was a purely missionary field with a very few scattered churches, very feeble, financially and numerically. The younger generation can hardly realize what an episcopal visitation meant in those days in labor, fatigue, and exposure. The only railroad of note in the State then was the Memphis & Little Rock. Traveling was by slow stage, private conveyance, or by boat. The roads were rough and very rocky.

In 1871, Ascension Day, a convocation was called, and a diocesan organization effected. The new work was prosecuted with renewed vigor. Then there were only five church buildings, one parsonage, 705 communicants. But now, what a contrast! There are nearly 30 church buildings, 16 parsonages, one guild hall, nearly 3,000 communicants, and a church membership of 15,000. The diocese has property valued at something over $225,000, and the offerings for religious purposes are about $25,000 a year. The Bishop built the magnificent Trinity cathedral, and also St. Paul's church, Little Rock, for the colored people.

Bishop Pierce was married April 18, 1855, to Miss Nannie H. Sheppard, at Matagorda, Tex. His wife survives him, likewise a son, the Rev. A. Wallace Pierce, and two daughters, Mrs. G. A. Lyman and Mrs. William C. Stevens.

The funeral services were conducted at Trinity cathedral, Little Rock, Thursday, the 7th inst., and, according to compact between father and son, the Rev. A. Wallace Pierce officiated. At ten o'clock the Holy Eucharist was celebrated, the Rev. Mr. Pierce, celebrant; the Rev. J. J. Vaux and the Rev. D. B. Ramsay (two oldest priests in point of residence, and bosom friends of the Bishop) being Gospel and Epistolist, respectively. Nearly all the clergy of the diocese, together with the Rt. Rev. Drs. Brown, Tuttle, and Garrett, were present. On the casket were six candles lighted. At five o'clock, on account of the heat, the regular Burial Service was said. The large building was crowded to its utmost capacity, the people thus bearing silently their testimony of love to their beloved Bishop, venerable in years, patriarchal in appearance, and venerated by hundreds and thousands of hearts throughout the State of Arkansas, where he gave the best years of his life in the service of the Master and humanity.

At a meeting of the clergy of the diocese of Arkansas, held at Little Rock, on the 7th inst., the following minute was unanimously adopted:

To-day the clergy of the diocese, here assembled, bear witness to their grief at the death of our beloved Diocesan, the Rt. Rev. Henry Niles Pierce, D.D., LL.D. As our chief in Holy Orders, his scholarship and spirituality were constant inspiration and guide. As our father in God, he was essentially judicial-minded, in no case ever listening to an ex-parte statement, no matter from whatever source it came. His sympathy always responded to our experience of life. He listened with a patient ear to the story of all our trials and sorrows, and left the narrator cheered and comforted. His mind was particularly that of an instructor, and it was a liberal education to listen to and appropriate his views on any subject. His hospitality was limited only by the circumstances of his habitation. His works were manifold and will live after him. They were beset with the difficulties and hardships of an early episcopate—successes and disappointments, which are matters of history, and will be discussed elsewhere.

These are some of the prominent characteristics of the Bishop and the man which endear his memory, sanctify his influence, and impress the nobility of Bishop Pierce upon us. While we mourn our loss on earth, we are not unmindful of the admonition, "not to sorrow as men without hope for those who die in the Lord." Our Bishop's clear thought, firm faith, and childlike trust, have been a blessing from our Lord and Master.

May the soul of the faithful departed rest in peace, and may light perpetual shine upon him.

The Bishops' testimonial to their departed brother is as follows:

The brethren of the House of Bishops, gathered at the funeral of the late Bishop of Arkansas to lay his sacred body by with the offices of honor and reverence belonging to a soldier brother, with deep and affectionate sympathy extended to his family and friends, desire to leave on record this tribute to his memory.

The late Bishop of Arkansas was a man of unusual mental energy. He was a constant student, and delighted in keeping perpetually fresh the university attainments of his early years. He was a graduate of Brown, and also professor of higher mathematics there. The young people of Little Rock know well how often they brought their mathematical problems and other puzzling questions to him for solution, always finding a cordial welcome and ready solution of their difficulties.

To the great force of natural ability the late Bishop united a marked persistence of character, working with unabated courage towards the attainment of purpose. The building of the cathedral illustrates these characteristics in an impressive manner. Almost single-handed he undertook the task of raising the necessary funds. The cathedral was to express in the concrete certain ideals which were dear to the Bishop's mind but lacked any exemplification in the diocese. The building in which the last solemn rites have just taken place over his remains stands as at once the monument and memorial of his earnestness and catholicity of mind and feeling. As a man, his scholarship and superior abilities gave him influence and authority; as a Bishop, he ruled his large and difficult field with courage and constancy. Every one knew his views. His trumpet gave no uncertain sound.

Consecrated Missionary Bishop of Arkansas and the Indian Territory, January 25th, 1870, and dying at Fayetteville, Ark., September 5th, 1899, while supplying the services of a faithful pastor who was taking a little time of needed rest, the Rt. Rev. Henry Niles Pierce, D.D., LL.D., was for nearly thirty years a leader of missionary work in one of the most eminently missionary regions of our domestic field. Obstacles were plentiful. Resources and help were meagre. But loyalty to the Church and his Master kept him unyieldingly steadfast to his aim of standing in his lot and doing duty to the end.

His counsel given in the House of Bishops was of great worth to his brethren, as was his leadership in the field of value to the Church at large. The Church militant mourns his loss, while grateful to the loving mercy of Almighty God that his faithful servant was spared to do service to the last of his days, and up to the seventy-ninth year of his earthly life.

DANIEL S. TUTTLE, Bishop of Missouri.
ALEXANDER C. GARRETT, Bishop of Dallas.
WM. M. BROWN, Bishop of Arkansas.

The Church in Honolulu

HONOLULU, H. I.
Festival of the Transfiguration, 1899.

DEAR LIVING CHURCH:—One of the pleasures in travel consists in finding in almost every place of any consequence, in every country, the Anglican Church in active work; truly, the sun never sets on her temples, and all peoples may hear her glorious liturgy and the Faith once delivered to the saints, from her gifted priests. This is none the less true of the Hawaiian Islands. About thirty seven years ago the S. P. G. planted her banner here, and the choir and part of the nave of a more imposing cathedral than our own in Chicago have been built, and the work is going on under the leadership of the Rt. Rev. Alfred Willis, D.D., Bishop of Honolulu, in three of the eight inhabited islands, and these are the principal ones. He has under his direction eight priests, one deacon, and a number of Sisters. There are, in addition to ordinary Church work, schools for boys and girls, and mission schools for the Chinese, on two of the islands.

This morning at seven we attended the Holy Communion in the cathedral; the celebrant was the Rev. V. H. Kikat, and his assistant was the Rev. Kong Yin Tet, the one a full-blooded Englishman, the other a full-blooded Chinaman; the congregation a mixture of native Hawaiians and Americans, or foreigners, as we are called here; the liturgy that of the Church of England. There had been, one hour before, a service in the Hawaiian language that I did not know of at the time, or I would have been there also. At eleven o'clock we attended service in St. Peter's chapel, the Chinese mission, the Rev. Kong Yin Tet, priest-in-charge, a bright young man from Southern China, educated in the Bishop's Honolulu school. There were at least one hundred Chinese present in the congregation, and a choir, not surprised, of about fifteen Chinese boys. The men sat on one side and the women on the other. There were one dozen little babies with their mothers, and at least one was given the nursing bottle during the reading of the Psalter. It was very pleasant to see the babies; they were all good, and did not in any way disturb the worship; how much better to have them here than to deprive the mothers of the benefits of the service. The music was excellent; the organist was a young Chinaman, and I have never heard the familiar chants and hymns of our dear Church better rendered in any chapel; the whole service was hearty and most reverent. Truly a great work is being done among these our brethren.

At 3:30 o'clock we again went to the cathedral to attend a service in the Hawaiian language. It was conducted by a native lay-reader whose name I did not get. He read the service, played the organ, led the singing, and preached a sermon very earnestly, and without notes. The congregation made the responses very generally, and the service was very reverent.

To hear the services of our Church in three languages in one day is, to say the least, unique.

The annexation of these beautiful islands, "these gems of the Pacific," will soon be completed, and then the Church in the United States must take up this important work, and push it with no less energy than the Church of England has, for surely she has demonstrated, here as elsewhere, her power to bring all nations into a universal brotherhood through Jesus Christ our Lord.

Yours truly,
D. R. BROWER.

Brotherhood of St. Andrew

Over 200 delegates, representing the dioceses of New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania, held a three days' conference at Asbury Park, N. J., beginning Sept. 2d. At Trinity church, at 7 A. M., Sept. 3d, the Holy Communion was celebrated by the Rev. J. O. S. Huntington, of the Order of the Holy Cross. In the afternoon a meeting was held in Educational Hall, at which was a large attendance. Silas McBee, 2nd vice-president of the Brotherhood, presided. The Rev. N. B. W. Gallaway spoke on "Service," and the Rev. D. V. Gwilym, on "Prayer." At the evening meeting, Sept. 3d, in Educational Hall, the Rev. Dr. W. B. Bodine presided. G. Harry Davis, of Philadelphia, spoke on "The people's responsibility to the Church," and Dr. Huntington spoke on "The Church's responsibility to the people." Both topics were summed up by Dr. Bodine. The third day's session opened with John W. Wood general secretary of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew, presiding, and the subject for discussion, "The question box reversed," brought out some very valuable hints and suggestions. Bishop Scarborough followed in an address to the conference, urging activity and persistency along the lines of labor for which the Brotherhood was organized, and spoke of the work being done by Brother Gilbert, superior of the Order of the Brotherhood of Nazareth, and of the Home for Consumptives, at Priory Farm, Verbank. The afternoon session was consumed by the Junior Department of the Brotherhood in the discussion of "Opportunities," discussed under four heads: "How to seek them," by Benjamin Ludlow, of St. Matthew's, Philadelphia; "How to meet them," by Herbert A. Welch, of Holy Communion, New York; "The Brotherhood opportunity with Juniors," by George M. Kimberlin, of Memorial, Baltimore, and "The Junior director," by Henry W. Harvest, of All Angels, New York. The closing address was made by the Rev. Lester Bradner, on "The future of the Brotherhood depends upon the boys."

Chicago

Wm. Edward McLaren, D.D., D.C.L., Bishop

The Bishop is expected to return on the 15th, and will represent the Presiding Bishop at Evansville on St. Luke's Day, when the Rev. J. M. Frances, D.D., will be consecrated Bishop of Indiana.

Bishop Gray of Southern Florida has been a visitor in Chicago, preaching in Grace church last Sunday morning, and in St. Peter's in the evening.

The Rev. Canon Knowles, now of St. Chrysostom's, New York, was a very welcome visitor at the Clericus in the Church Club last Monday, having preached in St. Mark's, Evanston, last Sunday morning, and in the Epiphany the preceding Sunday.

The Dean of the North-eastern Deanery has asked the Rev. C. P. Anderson to summon for him the members of the convocation for farewell to Bishop-elect Williams.

Corner Stone of St. Paul's, Kankakee

The deferred meeting of the Southern Deanery was held at Kankakee on Tuesday evening, Sept. 5th. On Wednesday morning there was a celebration of the Holy Communion, with the Dean as celebrant. At Morning Prayer, 10:30 A. M., a sermon on missionary work was preached by the Rev. Geo. W. Farrar, rector of Christ Church, Ottawa. Other clergymen present were the Rev. Dr. Rushton, W. B. Walker, of Joliet, Edward H. Clark, of Pontiac, and J. H. Edwards, of the church of Our Saviour, Chicago, for 10 years or more a member of the deanery as rector at Ottawa. After lunch and a business meeting, at the invitation of the rector of St. Paul's, the Rev. Dr. Phillips, an adjournment was had; and at 4:45 P. M., those named above, preceded by Mr. Frank Stebbins, soon to be ordained, proceeded from the public library building, in which the congregation has for some time been worshipping, to the site of the new church edifice, the Rt. Rev. John H. White, Bishop of Michigan City, holding the position of honor in the little procession. Arrived at the new erection, the walls of which are already 12 ft. high, the Bishop conducted the brief, but impressive, service, which began with Psalm LXXXIV. said responsively. In the metallic box behind the corner-stone, the dean had deposited copies of the last Convention Journal, the Office for the Day, THE LIVING CHURCH, and other Church papers, the local newspapers, Spirit of Missions, names of city officers, architects and contractors, of officers, teachers, and scholars of the Sunday school, photographs of Dr. Phillips and his vestrymen, with a letter addressed to an unknown successor of 50, 100, or 500 years hence, when the box is found, giving a history of the parish and its present condition. On the face of the stone are the simple inscriptions, Ad Gloriam Dei, and "St. Paul's church, 1899," with a cross between. After laying this corner-stone, Bishop White, in a brief, but excellent, address, expressed his pleasure at participating in an event which crowned the life work of the loved rector, with whom he had been on terms of cordial friendship for 20 years. In a few remarks, the Rev. W. Bohlen Walker emphasized the fact that the builders of the church were those who needed it. And thus closed the proceedings of a day, the full issue of which, in the completion of the edifice about Jan. 1st, will stand as a splendid monument to over 30 years' faithful and beloved pastorate of the Rev. Duane S. Phillips, D.D., rector of St. Paul's, Kankakee, and dean of the Southern Convocation.

Movements of the Clergy

The camping clergy have nearly all returned. The Rev. Messrs. C. H. Bixby, W. C. DeWitt, and P. C. Wolcott have resumed their respective places; the Rev. A. L. Williams is at the "Soo," but will be at home on Sunday; the Rev. Luther Pardee, the last to return, is on his way down. The Rev. Dr. Little has returned from the East, and is moving into his new rectory, which almost adjoins the church. After returning from camp at Paw-Paw Lake, the Rev. J. Henry and Mrs. Hopkins had two weeks' vacation in Burlington, Vt., their former home, the Rev. A. W. Higby "supplying" the Sundays at the Epiphany. Unusually large congregations were the rule in July and August; nor was the Sunday school closed. On the evening of the 3d, the Rev. T. D. Ward, of Philadelphia, was preacher. Bishop Gray is expected to preach on Sunday next. The Rev. Mr. Cross is in New York all this month.

New York

Henry Codman Potter, D.D., LL.D., Bishop

Free open air services in New York city were conducted Sunday afternoon, Sept. 3d, by the Rev. Walter E. Bentley.

Memorial of Professor Oliver

A memorial church, in memory of the late Rev. Prof. Andrew Oliver, of the General Theological Seminary, and his wife, is to be erected at Washington, among the Berkshire hills, in Massachusetts. It is to be called the church of St. Andrew. The corner-stone was laid Sept. 4th.

Church of the Archangel

The congregation of this church, the Rev. Geo. S. Pratt, rector, which was given permission for a month to hold services in the crypt of the cathedral of St. John the Divine, have received from Bishop Potter official consent to continue holding services there for the present, pending the completion of an edifice of their own.

St. Ambrose Church

A new arrangement has been made by the City Mission Society, for St. Ambrose's church, which is under its care. The Rev. Stephen Inness, a recent graduate of the General Theological Seminary, has been appointed head of a staff of workers, who are to conduct operations somewhat on the college settlement plan.

Church Services Resumed

Several churches which have been temporarily closed for repairs or improvements, have been re-opened, and full services in all churches were re-commenced on Sunday, Sept. 31. At St. James' church, the Rev. E. Walpole Warren, rector, the work on chancel and aisles has been completed. The new tiling has distinctly improved the church's acoustics. At the church of the Holy Trinity, Harlem, services have been begun, after a temporary closing of the sacred edifice for changes in the heating arrangements.

The Church of the Ascension

Is feeling the need of a summer home of its own, to provide for its fresh air work. It has nearly abandoned the sending of children to scattered farms, finding many abuses to be the result of that system. At present it concentrates the little ones in a few localities, and provides for about 2,000 days of outing in this way during the heated term. The Brotherhood of St. Andrew is especially co-operating in giving free vacations to poor city boys. The Brotherhood has provided for about 50 boys this summer.

City Mission Fresh-Air Outings

Under care of the City Mission Society, two excursions by water have been given to the children of St. Ambrose' chapel and God's Providence mission. Outings have also been given at a cottage at Tenaflly, N. J.; Calvary Home, at Carmel, N. Y.; a boarding-house at Nyack-on-the-Hudson, and at the cathedral summer home, at Tompkin's Cove, N. Y. Two consignments of boys have been cared for at the home of the Brothers of Nazareth, at Verbank, N. Y., and women and girls have been looked after in a temporary home, at Haines' Falls, in the Catskill Mountains. St. John's Seaside Hospital has cared for the sick.

St. Stephen's College, Annandale

A movement is on foot having in view the removal of St. Stephen's College from Annandale, N. Y., to this city. A committee of the trustees has been appointed on the question, consisting of Ven. Archdeacon Carey, D.D., of Saratoga Springs, and one of the most active of the alumni of the college, and Messrs. Spencer Trask, S. Nicholson Kane, Theodore Gibbs, and Charles Frederick Hoffman, Jr.—the father of the latter having been the chief benefactor of the institution. Some financial considerations will be offered, it is understood, if removal can be effected, but the heavy cost of land in New York stands in the way of the purchase of a large enough site. This difficulty has led to a proposal that the college be placed on part of the land now owned by the trustees of the cathedral of St. John the Divine, the trustees making a free grant for the purpose. The idea is being considered, as St. Stephen's is a diocesan institution, and as it mainly aims at fitting men to be candidates for Holy Orders. It is pointed out that the college would greatly gain by proximity to Columbia University and its library, and that the students would be enabled to attend some of the university courses of lectures. Arrangements have been made to supplement the income of St. Stephen's from its present endowment, for the next five years, by private subscriptions of some of its own trustees. Whether the college removes, or remains on its old site at Annandale, its affairs are decidedly looking up.

Pennsylvania

Ozi William Whitaker, D.D., LL.D., Bishop

Bishop Whitaker is expected home from Europe on or about the 23d inst.

Emmanuel church, Holmesburg, the Rev. A. H. Hord, rector, is to have a new chancel, choir room, and sacristy. The present gable wall of the chancel and side walls of the organ chamber are to be removed, and an addition 51 x 31½ feet erected.

The French church of St. Sauveur, Philadelphia, the Rev. Dr. C. Miel, rector, re-opened for service on Sunday, 3d inst. At Holy Trinity church, the new assistant, the Rev. G. B. Griffith, assumed his duty on Sunday, 3d inst., and the new choirmaster and organist, Ralph Kinder, took charge of the recently re-organized choir.

Girls' Friendly Society

The increase of members has been large in many of the parishes throughout the diocese, and this year's work has been of greater value than ever before. Holiday House, the vacation home at Cape May, N. J., has been most successfully operated during the present season, which will close about the middle of September.

Outings for Poor Children

The Sanitarium, organized by Philadelphia Churchmen in 1877, and still officered and managed by prominent members of our Communion, although generally characterized as unsectarian, has, during the present season of 70 working days, cared for 141,377 small children and infants, beside 23,046 mothers and attendants. Many of the children were admitted to the hospital on the grounds, and but one case, an infant, resulted fatally. The two Sanitarium steamers made several trips daily from various points of Philadelphia, to the charming locality down the river.

Kansas

Frank Rosebrook Millsapugh, D.D., Bishop
Visitations by Bishop Millsapugh

The Bishop visited Argentine, five miles from Kansas City, on Aug. 27th, and held service in the new church, nearly completed. The parishioners have waited for it for several years, working at the same time, and now, with the help of the manager of the smelter, they are rewarded. It is free from debt. Mankato, the Bishop could not reach on account of the wreck of his own train. He was not hurt, and no one was killed. He made the next appointment at Goodland, 400 miles from the see city. Here there was a pleasant surprise. The little band had added a chapel to their church, and paid for it. The chief railroad official of this division, headquarters of the C & R. O. R. R., was among the number confirmed. At Kirwin, the next place, the Bishop received one from the Church of Rome, without Confirmation, who made a public renunciation of R. C. dogmas.

North Dakota

Samuel C. Edsall, D.D., Bishop

Bishop Edsall spent a part of July and August with his family at Detroit, Minn., but supplied the pulpit at Gethsemane church, Fargo, on Sundays in August, the rector, the Rev. Mr. Mooney, being absent on vacation.

On the occasion of his last official visit to St. John's church, Larimore, Archdeacon Appleby was presented by the congregation with a very handsome embroidered white silk stole.

The Bishop's Visitations

On Monday, Aug. 28th, the Bishop left for Crary, a small town on the Great Northern railway, east of Devil's Lake. Here there has stood for some years the shell of a frame church, which, however, was never completed; there had been talk of selling the church for old lumber, but as the result of Bishop Edsall's visitation, money was subscribed sufficient to complete and paint the exterior of the church; and services are to be held there once a month on a week night, by the Rev. Mr. Turner, of Devil's Lake.

Indian Work at Fort Totten

On the 29th, the Bishop visited our Indian work at Fort Totten. During the past year several improvements have been made in the chapel there; a chancel platform has been put in and the interior rendered more churchly. The Bishop found the work at Fort Totten in a most encouraging state. The Rev. W. D. Rees presented a class of 22 for Confirmation, and afterward the Holy Communion was administered to between 40 and 50. The Bishop said most of the Confirmation service in the Dacotah, or Sioux language, and presented to each person confirmed, and to each one receiving Communion, a pretty gold cross, to be suspended from the neck with a purple ribbon. The Bishop's sermon was interpreted by John S. Brown, our native helper; Harvey Kersetter, our white helper, also participated in the service. In addition to the services at the Fort, services are conducted every Sunday at two distant points on the reservation, Raven Hill and the Bend. These services are held in private houses, and in very cramped and inadequate quarters. The Indians at each place begged the Bishop to give them a little chapel, and said if they had these chapels they had many heathen neighbors who could be brought to the services.

Narrow Escape of Bishop Edsall

The next day the Bishop, accompanied by the Rev. Mr. Rees and Mr. Kerstetter, drove 17 miles to Minnewaukan, where services were held in the Presbyterian church, a congregation of about 40 being present; certainly a good showing for a Tuesday morning. It is hoped to inaugurate monthly services there, under Mr. Rees and Mr. Kerstetter. From Minnewaukan the Bishop and Mr. Rees journeyed via Jamestown and Bismarck, to our work on the Standing Rock reservation on the Cannon Ball. On the long stage ride from Bismarck to Cannon Ball, an accident occurred which might easily have resulted more seriously. At the first stopping place the three gentlemen in the stage alighted, the remaining passenger, a lady, remaining in the stage. While the stage driver was depositing his mail sacks in the vehicle, the horses suddenly started forward. Bishop Edsall sprang to their heads and endeavored to stop their course; they plunged and reared wildly, lifting him from the ground, and finally threw him violently to the ground, and broke away, the stage narrowly missing his prostrate body. The lady in the stage in whose behalf the Bishop had made this effort, jumped from the flying vehicle, and was seriously injured, having to be sent back to the Bismarck hospital for treatment; while the Bishop and Mr. Rees continued their journey to Cannon Ball.

Interesting Services at Cannon Ball

The visitation there continued from Friday until Sunday, Sept. 31. On Friday afternoon the Bishop administered Confirmation to eight Indians, who had been prepared by our faithful helper, Thomas Ashley. On Sunday there was an unusual combination of services; first, Mr. Rees officiated at the funeral of a young Indian woman—the first part of the service being held in our chapel, and the burial in our little church cemetery near by; next, the Bishop, with the assistance of Mr. Rees, baptized six Indian children, and an additional class of six was presented by Mr. Rees, for Confirmation; then followed the celebration of the Holy Communion, at which 49 received, and the Bishop performed the marriage ceremony for a young Indian couple, both of whom are members of our Church families. A large congregation were present, and were most devout in their demeanor. The chapel of the Cannon Ball is being improved by the erection of a tower, or vestibule, in which will hang the bell given by "The Little Helpers," under the direction of Miss Hart, of Rochester, N. Y. Still further improvements are sorely needed to render this chapel safe and habitable in winter. The Bishop gave directions for the bracing of the roof, ceiling of the interior, and construction of chancel platform and vestry. He will need at least $125 to pay for these improvements. At Standing Rock, also, we need a chapel for the Indians living at Upper Cannon Ball. Services are held there every other Sunday by Alexander HisWar, a native Indian helper. The Bishop expects to ordain Thomas Ashley to the diaconate, and later on will also probably ordain Alexander HisWar. The Bishop congratulated Mr. Rees on the 36 Confirmations in his field; he has certainly been doing a noble work, under great discouragements and against bitter Roman opposition,

Ohio

Wm. Andrew Leonard, D.D., Bishop

Death of Rev. N. P. Charlot

The Rev. Nathaniel P. Charlot died at his home on Doan ave., East Cleveland, at 10 o'clock Sunday morning, Sept. 3d., having reached the great age of nearly 90 years. He was born in a small town in New Jersey, Jan. 2nd, 1810. His parents removed to Athens, O., while he was very young, and after receiving a collegiate and ministerial education, he was ordained by the Presbyterian Church. In 1857, while engaged in missionary work in the South, he became a member of the Episcopal Church, and in 1858 was admitted to the order of deacons by the Rt. Rev. Leonidas Polk, Bishop of Louisiana. In the following year he was ordained a priest by the same bishop. Shortly before the breaking out of the Civil War, the Rev. Mr. Charlot entered the army, and was appointed chaplain of the 22nd Indiana Volunteers. In 1866 he took charge of St. Paul's church, East Cleveland. From that time till his death his work has been in the diocese of Ohio, with the exception of five years when he was rector of a church in Illinois. In addition to his spiritual and intellectual gifts, Mr. Charlot was in many ways a wonderful man. He had great physical energy. Although nearly 90 years of age he had worn glasses only once, and then more for appearance' sake than from necessity. He was an enthusiastic wheelman and pedestrian, and even up to the time of his last illness, was accustomed to walk and ride distances which would put many a younger man to shame. His long ministry of 60 years was characterized by devotion to his work, and loving care for others, and after an illness of three months and much suffering, patiently borne, he rests in the Paradise of God. The funeral services were held at his home on Tuesday, September 5th, and were conducted by the Rev. E. W. Worthington, a number of the clergy of the city and vicinity being present.

The Cleveland Clericus

Held its first autumn meeting at "The Hillman," on Monday, September 4th. A good number of the clergy were present, and several new faces were noted, as for instance, the Rev. Harry St. John Hathaway, who has just taken the charge of St. Andrew's in the East, the Rev. Wilson R. Stearly, in charge of Emmanuel church, and the Rev. A. C. Jones, the new rector of the church of the Holy Spirit. The Rev. E. L. Kemp read an interesting paper, giving reminiscences of his work in the diocese of Ohio, covering a long period, which was all the more prized, since he is about to remove to the diocese of Arkansas. The Rev. W. Rix Attwood, of All Saints' church, was chosen president for the ensuing year, and the Rev. Mr. Hathaway, secretary.

Corner Stone of St. Martin's, South Omaha

Laid in the presence of a large congregation, on the afternoon of the 10th Sunday after Trinity, Aug. 13th. The procession of choir and clergy marched from the present chapel to the platform erected near the stone, reciting antiphonally Psalm xxxii. Upon reaching the platform, the hymn "Christ is made the sure foundation," was sung. Prayers were read by the Rev. Dr. Doherty. A list of the deposits laid in the stone was read by the Rev. Irving P. Johnson, rector of the parish, after which the stone was placed and blessed by Canon Whitmarsh, who delivered an historical address, after which a strong sermon was preached by the Rev. William Everett Johnson, of the church of the Redeemer, New York, from the text, "Hallowed be Thy Name." The Rev. Rufus D. Stearns pronounced the benediction. The new St. Martin's, which is to be a memorial to the late John S. Minor, of Detroit, Mich., one of Bishop Worthington's devoted parishioners, is to be a handsome stone edifice of gothic style, and of a ciform in shape, finished in oak, and having a seating capacity of 300. Two lots, the most desirable in South Omaha, which is a growing city of 20 000 inhabitants were recently purchased by Bishop Worthington at a great bargain, from a fund left to his discretionary use by Mr. Minor, the congregation stipulating to build as soon as possible a stone church thereupon as a Minor memorial. They have been able to build much sooner than expected. When completed, the building will have cost about $10,000. It will be ready for consecration in October.

Missionary Meeting at Fort Worth

On the evening of Tuesday, August 8th, the Board of Missions of the diocese met in quarterly session in St. Andrew's parish house, Fort Worth, at the request of the Rev. B. B. Ramage, rector, the meeting having been held heretofore at Dallas, the see city. The Bishop and nine clergymen were present, also seven representatives of the Woman's Auxiliary, from different towns, and the members of St. Andrew's and Trinity branches, Fort Worth, who were invited to confer with the Bishop and clergy. After shortened Evensong, addresses were given, by the Bishop on general mission work in the diocese, and the ways in which he had been able to collect funds from cities in the East, to build churches and rectories, and support the first missionaries, also to build and endow St. Mary's Hall, the Church school for girls, at Dallas; by the Rev. J. O. Miller, on missions in towns, giving his own experiences in such; and by the Rev. W. K. Lloyd, on "Church extension in new fields." An offering of $86.25 was received, and the whole amount was given to the Bishop for work in the diocese. The church was filled with a large and attentive congregation, and the music was excellent. On Wednesday, 9th, there was an early Celebration at 7 A. M., the Bishop being the celebrant, at which a large number received. At 9:30 a conference took place between the Bishop and clergy and the representatives of the Woman's Auxiliary. The Bishop's address was most excellent, suggesting ways in which the great work of Christian missions could be helped by the laity. Mrs. Wallace, president of the diocesan Woman's Auxiliary, spoke on the Triennial Offering, and the Auxiliary. Mrs. Ramage, secretary and treasurer of the diocesan branch, spoke ably and earnestly of the Junior Auxiliary and its work; a report of the work of one Junior Auxiliary branch was given by one of its members. Mrs. Joy, of Abilene, gave a very encouraging report of Auxiliary work in the parish. Mrs. W. G. Poole, corresponding secretary of St. Andrew's chapter, spoke of help in building churches and rectories, and suggested that money be raised by systematic offerings, however small. Several of the clergy spoke on these topics, and there was a general feeling of unusual interest manifested. At noon the meeting adjourned to a parish lunch at the rectory, thus concluding a very helpful and successful session. The next will be held in November at Denison.

Corner Stone of Church Laid

On August 7th the Bishop laid the corner stone of St. Stephen's church, Alva, Okla. He was assisted in the service by the Rev. L. S. Swan, priest-in-charge, and Mr. S. G. Porter, lay-reader. The church is to be a modest but neat frame building, within the means of the people. Except for a small loan from the Building Fund Commission, there will be no debt, and the people will provide nearly all the cost themselves. The mission is small in numbers, but Alva is an important field, being the seat of the N. W. normal school of the territory, one of the most promising of the territorial institutions, and to which will come this fall a large number of students.

Massachusetts

William Lawrence, D. D., Bishop

The Rev. Father Osborne has returned from England, and has been appointed provincial superior of the society of St. John the Evangelist in place of Father Longridge, who has been appointed assistant superior general of the order, and remains in England.

A large reflector has been placed in St. Matthew's church, South Boston. This will greatly improve the lighting of the interior, and supplies a long-felt need.

St. Augustine's Church, Boston

The festival of its patron saint was observed with special services. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Father Osborne. On Sunday of the octave, Father Hayward of Philadelphia was the preacher. A children's processional was held one afternoon, and many social events followed. This large work among the colored flock has greatly prospered under the Rev. Father Field.

All Saints' Church, Worcester

The Women's Missionary Society shows an excellent record of work during its 20 years' existence. It has supplied during this time the needs of clergymen in 13 States and Territories, and has sent out nearly $10,000 in missionary boxes.

Funeral of Mrs. Ellen C. Johnson

Bishop Whipple officiated, Sept. 7th, at the funeral of Mrs. Ellen C. Johnson, superintendent for 16 years of the Reformatory for Women at Sherborn, and a well-known philanthropist and penologist. Mrs. Johnson entered into rest from the residence of the Rt. Rev. Dr. Talbot, Bishop of Rochester, where she was a guest at the time of the meeting of the Prison Congress in London, before which she delivered an address a few hours before her translation. The remains were cremated in London. During the service in the chapel, the urn containing the ashes rested in front of the chancel, and was completely covered with floral tributes. Afterwards, the urn was deposited in the family lot. Bishop Whipple made a brief but beautiful eulogy.

Rev. S. G. Jeffords' Tenth Anniversary

St. Paul's, Peoria, celebrated on Sunday, Sept. 31, the 10th anniversary of the rectorate of the Rev. Sydney G. Jeffords. The key note of the common feeling, the services and sermons of the day, was profound gratitude to God to whom, as rector and people felt, was due all the honor and all the praise for the success attained during this period. The chief service of the day was the Holy Communion. The rector was celebrant; the Rev. Dr. L. Klingwell read the Gospel; the Rev. Charles D. Andrews, rector of Christ church, St. Paul, Minn., the Epistle. Mr. Andrews also preached the sermon, Mr. Jeffords having been his curate before coming to Peoria. The ten years' report of the rector of St. Paul's church was read by the Rev. D. D. Hefter, curate: Number of families increased from 105 to 228; total number of souls, from 450 to 993; Baptisms—adults, 130, infants and children, 373, total, 503; confirmed, 336; marriages, 130; burials, 176; communicants, number reported at convention of May, 1889, 187, admitted by Confirmation, 336, received, 255, removed or transferred, 136, died, 41, present number, 601; celebrations of the Holy Eucharist—Sundays, 712, other days, 609, total, 1,321; services on Sundays, 1,123, other days, 1,384, total, 2,507. The financial report from May, 1889, to May, 1899, for parochial, diocesan, provincial, and general purposes, amounts to $80,154.96. These statistics, however, fail to show the remarkable advance made by the Church, within ten years, in Peoria. During that time, the bequest of a pious layman has helped to the building of a $20 000 stone church, and the gathering and organization of a new congregation, St. Andrew's. The Rev. Samuel G. Welles has been in charge of this promising and interesting work for two years, aided by a number of unusually earnest, devoted, and intelligent men and women. At St. Andrew's, with its Sunday school, under Mr. W. H. Boniface, and the Boys' Club, under Mr. Fillmore Millard, one may learn a practical object lesson as to the value and significance of the Sunday school in training the young, preparing them for, and holding them within, the Church. St. Stephen's mission is the third Church enterprise launched by the Rev. S. G. Jeffords in Peoria. In February, 1898, Mr. Jeffords rented the rooms on S. Adams st., still occupied by the mission. Dr. Collamer, lay-reader, took hold of the work with devotion, zeal, and tact, Mr. Richard Wray also devoted himself to the work. An inspiring story could be told of the men and women who, in the face of discouragements and at the cost of very real personal sacrifice, went out into the highways and byways and gathered in almost 100 children, who were instructed in the Sunday school, helped and taught in a Saturday afternoon industrial school, visited and looked after in many ways. The Rev. D. D. Hefter now has joined this band of lay-workers. The problem of the mission is a peculiar one. As carried on now, the work presents many features of a social settlement; in the part of the city where it is located, much institutional, social, and philanthropic work would seem to be required. Practically, at present, the whole work rests upon the rector of St. Paul's broad shoulders of faith; it is due to his enterprise and missionary zeal, and to the Christlike devotion of a small band of lay-workers; but it is hoped that the Church at large and the community will soon awaken to the importance of the field, that within a year the necessary lots will be procured, within two years, at least, the basement of St. Stephen's church will be built, and so the foundation laid for what must rapidly grow into a large and widely influential Church work. Mr. Jeffords is already planning two other missions in the city of Peoria, and he hopes to see in time, the present number of parishes (three) doubled.

Editorials and Contributions

WE printed last week an appeal for poor Puerto Rico, issued by the Bishop who is in charge of the interests of this Church in that island. The appeal should be emphasized until a wide response enables our representatives at Ponce, San Juan, and elsewhere, to extend intelligent aid in the name of Christ and the Church, to the poor people who have been so terribly smitten. It is hoped that our clergy and laity will see the need of turning their donations in this particular direction, rather than in others where the Church will not have the credit, nor her faithful agents on the island the disbursing. And there should be no delay. In some of our dioceses the bishops have authorized a general collection in all the churches.

"SHAME! SHAME!" is the cry of the whole world upon the cowardly court-martial in France. "Guilty," is the verdict of mankind, not against the poor wretch who has been racked at Rennes, after five years of torture on Devil's Island,—not against Dreyfus, but against France. No doubt this monstrous perversion of justice is chargeable to "corruption in the army." France is responsible for her army, and she will have to answer before God and at the bar of civilization for one of the most infamous crimes of history. A man may escape the consequences of his sins in this world; there is an eternity in which his reckoning will be made sure. But a nation must expiate the wrongs it does, now and here. France should know this, for her punishments have been heavy. Another will come if she does not right this wrong. The case is thus briefly and forcibly stated by one of Chicago's great lawyers, Luther Laflin Mills:

The trial was a farce, and its result is a tragedy of injustice. The verdict against Dreyfus is utterly without credible evidence to sustain it, and is clearly, if not admittedly, rendered for ulterior reasons by a tribunal subservient to the power of the military, and willingly sacrificing human rights to a mere expediency. It is a blow to France, whose effects will be immeasurable; it places in the record of French civilization a fact of disgrace which will be denounced by mankind as long as the heart of Christendom continues to revolt against outrages upon humanity. But the end of the Dreyfus case is not yet reached.

A MAN is known by the books he reads as well as by the company he keeps, and so it is with a people. The immoral and flippant literature with which France is flooded, prepares a soil where scandals flourish, and the strong virtues fail. No nation is without degenerates who write and read such trash, but among the Anglo Saxons it cannot be said to be broadly popular as it is among the Latins. The books which have a large sale, the "books of the day" in England and America, are books which have at least a decent basis of morality. While they do not as a rule find their ideals in religion or the loftiest virtue, they do not and dare not scoff at the average morality which gives to this race its wide influence in the world.

THAT is very good, so far as it goes, but it is much to be deplored that it goes no further, that a higher tone and higher ideals do not prevail. Even the better class of the books and magazines of the day, which are read by the most intelligent of our people, seem to aim at nothing but entertainment. Are we a race of intellectual dwarfs who must be everlastingly amused by pictures and stories? If we are not already, we are in danger of becoming so. How long will the sturdy morality of the race endure, if it finds all its ideals of conduct and character without any reference to God? Our popular literature is practically godless, as it is claimed our public schools must be. We are a nation of readers, but what do we read? The daily papers, the magazines, the books which make us laugh or cry, scarcely anything else. Publishers are afraid to undertake a serious book without a guarantee of expense for the first edition.

MR. SHELTON'S books, of which "In His Steps" is perhaps the best known, are a hopeful exception to the rule. They demonstrate the fact that there are millions of readers who are interested in the serious questions of life and duty. There is sale for books which refer to the "old, old story," which appeal to conscience and the higher life. There are vast numbers of readers who are glad to be reminded of the things unseen and eternal, of the realities which ennoble common life, which make poverty endurable and sacrifice sublime. If the taste of the age is for the picturesque presentation of such truths, let them be so presented. It is worse than folly, it is a sin, for writers who have the attention of the whole world, to ignore the Rock from which the choicest work of their imagination is carved, and to present it as the product of human excellence alone. Religion is a power that cannot be safely ignored in any great work of life or letters.

Education and Religion in Japan

IN the June number of The Church in Japan, we find a long article on "Japanese Education," quoted from the Japan Mail. It is a discussion of the recent proposals of the High Educational Council, to which we referred in a recent issue. Besides other measures well calculated to embarrass the educational side of Christian missionary work, there is one to which The Mail points as the most interesting and important of all. It is a proposal that not only in schools under State control, but in all "schools which enjoy special privileges from the government, no religious instruction must be given and no religious exercises performed." This is the proposal which, if carried out, would be the severest blow to Christian schools. These schools, by conforming their curricula to the official standards, enjoy exemption from conscription. With that privilege removed, the parents of boys have a powerful reason for preferring the public schools. The mission schools might have to close their doors for want of pupils. The Mail makes an indignant protest against all such measures in the name of liberty of conscience which the Constitution of Japan professes to secure to all Japanese subjects. According to The Mail, it is the Christians alone who would be injured by such legislation. The Buddhists gave in to the State system of non-religious schools long ago, and apparently have never cared enough about the matter to establish private schools. "Buddhism is at present moribund." "As for Shinto, it has no part in the discussion. It is a cult, not a creed. Its sphere is in the cemetery, not in the life of the people." "But both these elements join with the increasing body of educated free-thinkers in obstructing Christianity." It appears, also, that the "University Section" have set up a religion of their own, based upon certain patriotic principles, such as the heavenly ancestry of the sovereigns and the divine origin of their land. The old paganism has no fault to find with this, but it places the Japanese Christians in an embarrassing position. They are liable to the suspicion of lack of loyalty to their country and its government. The position of things is, in a small way, curiously parallel to that which existed in the Roman Empire in the early days of Christianity. There were the numerous pagan cults, and there was the State religion with its worship of the emperors, which all must recognize. The Christians alone could not conform to this, and hence they were stigmatized as traitors and put under the ban of the empire. Such is the result which the "patriotic" and anti-foreign party will bring about in Japan, if they succeed in their present aims. It is a singular fact that this distorted nationalism should emerge at the very moment when Japan, by the recent treaties, has been admitted into the fellowship of civilized nations. The suspicion forces itself that this movement may have been premature.

Sir William Harcourt and the Archbishops

IT is to be supposed that Sir William Harcourt is satisfied with the effect of his letter to The Times. He declared, with his usual emphasis, that the decision of the Archbishops struck at the roots of the Catholic movement. It would seem, according to his reading of that decision, that the bishops have only to go on in the path which it marks out, and they will ultimately bring back the Church to the position in which it stood in 1833, on the day when Keble preached his celebrated sermon on "National Apostasy." The greatest religious revival in the history of the Church of England, and one which has affected, in a greater or less degree, every phase of English Christianity, is to be blotted out. This interpretation of the decision and its practical bearings, has apparently produced a commotion which the document itself does not contemplate. Whatever is to be said of the doctrine which makes the regulation of the worship of the Church depend upon an act of Parliament, it is certain from a careful reading of the decision, that the Archbishops would not admit the conclusions of Sir Wm. Harcourt. Moreover, it is not long since they appeared as the defenders against Roman aspersions of the sacrificial character of the Eucharist, one of the most important principles of the Catholic movement. But behind all this is the fact that Sir Wm. Harcourt is a principal leader of the liberal party. Upon the return of that party to power, it is possible that he will be Prime Minister. As such, he will be able to frame Acts of Parliament and to fill vacant sees. On the whole, it is not surprising that men who were never before willing to contemplate the idea of disestablishment, are beginning to face it as the least of the evils with which the Church is threatened; notwithstanding the fact that disestablishment means, almost certainly, disendowment, and, in all probability, interior disruption.

BUT Dean Church long ago pointed out that matters do not proceed in the Church of England along the lines of smooth and inevitable logic. It is doubtful whether they do anywhere. Where practical concerns are involved, and a thousand conflicting interests insist upon a fair hearing, and there are for every question various solutions, each with its determined advocates, it is never likely that anything will be finally closed through any such means as the interpretation of an Act of Parliament. No cold and formal machinery of legal enactments can settle questions which concern men's deepest convictions. It has already been seen in recent times that men are willing to endure any penalty and to suffer any loss rather than obey a law which they believe to be unjust and destructive of principles which they prize above life itself.

IT is a very shallow view of things which I would attribute the present troubles in England to a childish attachment for incense or other matters of ceremonial. The use of incense is comparatively infrequent. But hundreds of men are taking part in this struggle who have never used incense, and probably never would use it. The root of the matter lies in the relations of Church and State, and the question is the perennial one, whether those relations can ever be so adjusted, that remaining in union, the one will not encroach upon the province of the other. The solution is rendered more difficult from the fact that the governing power in the State is no longer Christian, or if it may still be classed as such, it is only in a vague and general sense, in the way commonly called "undenominational." Parliament, as it is now constituted, is a standing menace to the Church. At any time, by the incoming of a new party, the old half-conscious traditions which have hitherto served as a barrier to extreme action, may suddenly be swept away. Those who do not appreciate the state of things which lies behind the present anxieties of Churchmen in England, must necessarily fail to understand the true significance of the "crisis."

BUT when a politician or statesman expects to be able with the wave of his hand, armed with the opinion of the Archbishops upon a phrase in an ancient Act of Uniformity, to destroy the movement which, beginning at Oxford nearly seventy years ago, has permeated and transformed the Anglican Communion, not only in England, but throughout the world, he surely reckons without his host. It is the principles of this movement which give to the Anglican Church all the value it has for thousands of souls. It is not out of devotion to the Crown or loyalty to the State that they have bestowed upon it their heartfelt affection and spent their lives in its service, but because they believe it to be part and parcel of the Holy, Catholic, and Apostolic Church. Once convince them that this is not true, that the Church of England is merely the creation of the State, and hence subject in all things to its creator, that it is simply and solely a department of the government, and their regard for it will be extinguished, like a lamp blown out. But to effect this, it will be necessary to prove that Keble, Pusey, and the great company of able and devoted men who sprang up on every hand to carry out their teachings, were the victims of hallucination, and, more than all, that the wonderful change which has come over the Church is merely a transient phase, without permanent significance. In this case, the Anglican Church has no mission in the world except as one among the many Protestant bodies. The claims which have constituted her chief strength are seen to be invalid, and her glory will have passed away.

IT is a curious question, and one which presses for an answer, just how the Archbishops would define the present relations between Church and State, and whether they regard those relations as satisfactory. Many would like to know how far they are prepared to go in the direction of submission to Acts of Parliament in the field of religion. There seems no doubt that, according to the present English Constitution, there is no limit to the power of Parliament. It may pass the most radical and drastic laws in any department of government. There is no Supreme Court to pass upon the constitutionality of a law, and no fundamental instrument, like the Constitution of the United States, to which all legislative enactments must conform. There is nothing, except precedent and conservative tradition, to restrain the English Parliament from passing Acts vitally affecting the character of the Church. That the Church can endure anything which affects merely her temporal welfare is evident, but the question is how far can she submit to legislation touching her spiritual concerns and her inherent character? At what point would the constituted authorities, the Bishops and Archbishops, raise the standard of revolt; and say: "We must obey God rather than man?"

IT is true that in England men are not accustomed to deal so much with underlying principles and the possibilities of the future as with conditions as they arise, and it is well understood that an attempt on the part of Parliament to meddle directly with spiritual affairs, to take in hand, for instance, matters of faith, or the rubrics of the Prayer Book, would produce a convulsion which might give pause to any ministry, however radical. At present, and probably for some time to come, this will constitute a strong safeguard against such proposals as those brought forward last spring. But this means for English Churchmen an opportunity for strengthening their position. It is a time for disseminating the true doctrine of the Church as a spiritual institution which, as it existed before the State, so it has in itself all that is needful for existence apart from the State; and, in anticipation of the time when the present relations shall be severed, must be vigilant to allow nothing that may weaken its force or impair the strength and vigor of its life when the day of independence at length arrives.

Providence and Catastrophes

THE terrible explosion at Toulon raises once more the old, old question: Why does God permit such events to happen? It is not likely that the modern man by searching will find out God any more than those Eastern men whose speculations recorded in the Book of Job have expressed the thoughts and yearnings of countless generations of mankind. We can only restate the eternal problem, and suggest conclusions which have been suggested before, but which are always capable of restatement. Here are scores of innocent people killed and injured (some of the latter for life) by an unforeseen and sudden catastrophe, due either to "accident" or, as is whispered, to some diabolical act of treachery. How can it be justified? If society puts to death the man who causes acts like this, must we not impeach the Providence which permits the act and sustains the arm of the miscreant who effects it? The question is still asked by men whose faith in a divine and beneficent order is shocked by the occurrence of a tragedy which overtakes innocent victims, and who ask in the desolation of their souls, Can God be just?

The first answer which occurs to the mind when this problem is raised, is whether the negation of a divine Providence is of any help. If the tragedy was all without purpose, if it was merely due to molecular action uncontrolled by any supreme spiritual power, are we any further? Does the agnostic gain anything on that hypothesis? Obviously he does not, for he admits that matter is triumphant, and that the noblest aspirations of the noblest human soul may be cancelled by a mere physical act. The idealist (we use the term to cover all believers in a divine order) holds the faith that not a sparrow falls to the ground without the divine will; that "nothing walks with aimless feet"; that death is not the final fact in life, but only an inevitable means of transformation to a higher plane of life. Faith can meet the catastrophes of life with a firm hope that the merely subjective impressions which a finite being entertains of these catastrophes is not, and cannot be, identified with the objective facts as seen by an infinite intelligence. Thus the sceptic really gains nothing by his scepticism; the actual fact is to him just as terrible as to the believer, while the latter finds a hidden clue to the mystery which is sealed to the former. That a mere sudden chemical combination, itself without thought and controlled by no thought, irresponsible, regnant, a final fact in nature; should exercise the power of absolutely destroying that wonderful piece of work called a man, of canceling his will, intellect, soul, in a moment, and of wiping his personality out of the universe, is a thought so horrible, so unbearable, that if it were really believed by the bulk of the human race, madness on a gigantic scale would inevitably follow. We are kept sane by a reasonable faith that all we see, as Wordsworth says, is "full of blessings."

But, in the next place, it is worth noting that it is only the unusual tragedies of the world that call forth expressions of doubt or positive unbelief. "Every moment dies a man," and yet this constant passage of souls into the unknown produces no impression. It is only when wholesale death within a given area takes place, that men's minds are swayed by unbelief. The earthquake at Lisbon, we know, seriously affected the religious thought of Europe; though, we must recollect, it affected Europe at a time when faith was at a low ebb. But why should such an event affect the minds of men who profess, above all things, to be governed by reason? These men know how the crust of the earth is composed, they know of the volcanic formations, they know that if you build on these you must be prepared to take the consequences. They do not expect that letters of warning shall be traced by divine power on the sky; the uniformity of nature is the very fundamental article of their creed. So much for the naturalness of the catastrophe. But there is the subjective human side. Well, every one at Lisbon, every one at Toulon, had to die at some time; why not in one way as soon as in another? Is it worse to die suddenly than to die after months and years of protracted suffering? Is not the most painless death, so far as we can guess, the instantaneous death by a stroke of lightning? The victims at Toulon felt one tremendous shock, and all was over. But the victim of consumption in some dark city slum suffers a daily death, as it were; the patient in a cancer hospital can tell of a lingering agony which the thousands engulfed at Lisbon or in Ischia never knew. We need not for the moment, to use the words of Herodotus, carry up our story into the unseen world. Taking the facts as given here, we can only say that it is a vulgar illusion which strains at the Toulon explosion as being inconsistent with Divine Providence, and yet swallows without difficulty the single, common, every-day tragedies of human life.

But are there not, then, tragedies in life? It may be asked. Undoubtedly there are, but the tragedy is a thing of the soul, not of the body. Agamemnon, Hamlet, Othello, are not subjects of tragedy because of any misfortune which has happened to their bodies, or to their material goods; when we think of them we never think of these things which in the long procession of the ages are matters of absolute indifference. It is in the maimed or impotent soul, in the degraded character, that tragedy consists. Think of Shakespeare making the ground of tragedy the fact that the hero had broken his leg or lost a fortune! No, the souls in hell are there because, as Dante said of Epicurus, they have lost spiritual good. There, and there alone, is the groundwork of life's tragedies. What, then, it will be asked, are we to express no regret, no grief for these occurrences which shock the world? Now, we do not say that, for grief is natural to man, and it purges his nature and sweetens his character, so long as it does not degenerate into futile, hopeless melancholy. We are but men, and we need must grieve with our fellow-men, either when sitting by the bed of suffering, or hearing of the harrowing incidents in which scores of human beings are involved in what we cannot help, from our point of view, in regarding as a dire catastrophe. But we must always remember that grief is a pure expression of our point of view, which is limited, partial, finite. We know but a tiny segment of a vast circle. Within our little creek, to use Carlyle's simile, we have the minnow's right to say what we find there. But beyond that creek is the river, and beyond that the infinite sea; shall we, in our self-important littleness, dare to say what boundless possibilities are there? Who knows that the human soul called hurriedly from this little earth may not be needed in "the sounding-house vast of being"? What beneficent fate may not have been in store for those on whom the Tower of Siloam fell? In an infinite universe there are infinite possibilities. Let us recall to our minds the meaning and methods of the ever-renewed process of creation as the best suggestions of science and religion reveal them to us. From a merely subjective point of view, Nature seems "red in tooth and claw"; but Dr. Alfred Russel Wallace, writing as a man of science, tells us that, given sentient life, he cannot conceive of a universe capable of yielding a greater sum of enjoyment to every living being. We shudder to see the hawk swoop on the pigeon, or the snake holding the bird by its deadly fascination; but, as a matter of fact, we have every reason to believe that the victim in either case dies without pain. Once admit a world like ours to be gradually evolved, once admit the fact of sentient life climbing to higher and yet higher grades until it forms a vehicle for the expression of mind, and we see that facts are necessitated which, from our subjective standpoint, seem terrible. But even then one of these facts is no more terrible than another, and the death of a tiny child is as tragic as the death of a thousand people,—no more and no less. But if we hold that the world is not a final fact at any moment, that it has a purpose, that that purpose is being constantly worked out, but that the ultimate issues are revealed within the unseen, that the death of the body is not that of the soul, and that all which happens was included in the divine plan,—if we have faith to look at the universe in this way, and to see that it is not to be measured by our little subjective plummet, we shall not despair at the many seeming ills of human life.—The Spectator.

Letters to the Editor

CHURCH AND COLLEGE

To the Editor of The Living Church:

The undersigned earnestly request rectors having young men in their parishes who are now about to enter college, to send at once the names of such students to the rector in the college town. In one institution ten communicants were found in the freshman class last year, whose pastors had failed to communicate with the rector in the town. Church influences are needed at the outset, and often a long time elapses before Church students become known to the rector.

RECREATION FIGURES

To the Editor of The Living Church:

I was much interested in the article in THE LIVING CHURCH of Aug. 26th, under the above heading, but, permit me, as an arithmetician, to say that the article in question does not go far enough; in fact, it goes only a very little way.

It speaks of the figure nine as being a peculiar number, and so it is; but let us go back to one of its factors, and in this case its prime factors are the same number, viz., three. Some remarkable results can be attained with this number; for instance, take the numbers 4923681. Add these numbers together and we get the sum of 33. As 33 can be divided by three without a remainder, three will divide these numbers 4923681, and so with any sum where three will divide the sum of the numbers. Now to divide by six, add together the numbers, as in the first case, and if the right-hand figure is an even number, six will divide it; for example, 8264214. This added together produces 27. Three evenly divides 27; and as the right-hand figure of the quotient 8264214 is an even number, six will divide it. If the sum of the numbers can be divided by nine, as, for instance, 28143, then nine will divide the whole; and if the right-hand figure were an even number, then it can be divided by eighteen. If, after dividing by three, the two right-hand figures can be divided by twelve without remainder, twelve will divide the whole. If the two right-hand figures can be divided by four, then four will divide the whole. If the three right-hand figures can be divided by eight then eight will divide the sum. If the right-hand figure is five, or a cypher, five will divide it. If a cypher, ten will divide it. I know of no rule for testing seven for a divisor, but have showed how to divide by any number from one to ten excepting seven.

I might add a curious circumstance in connection with the figure nine, viz:

9 times 1 equals 9	The sum of the figures are:
9 " 2 " 18	1 plus 8 equals 9
9 " 3 " 27	2 " 7 " 9
9 " 4 " 36	3 " 6 " 9
9 " 5 " 45	4 " 5 " 9
9 " 6 " 54	5 " 4 " 9
9 " 7 " 63	6 " 3 " 9
9 " 8 " 72	7 " 2 " 9
9 " 9 " 81	8 " 1 " 9
9 " 10 " 90	9 " 0 " 9
9 " 11 " 99	9 " 9 " 18
9 " 12 " 108	10 " 8 " 18
9 " 13 " 117	11 " 7 " 18

And so on ad infinitum.

"IS IT RIGHT?"

To the Editor of The Living Church:

There can be no doubt that our work among the colored people is a most important one. But, seriously, is it not a mistake to maintain separate divinity schools for the education of colored men for the ministry, since nearly all of our theological seminaries most cheerfully admit colored men just as they do others? Is there any real need for such "colored" institutions? I verily believe that they are hindering, rather than helping, this great work. I understand that a colored presbyter of this Church is at the present time making an effort to raise an endowment of $50,000 for one of these "colored" institutions, known as the Bishop Payne Divinity School, located at Petersburg, Va. Whether it is wise to perpetuate such an institution or not may be judged from a quotation from a little paper published by the Archdeacon of Southern Virginia, The Southern Missioner, which will certainly give some idea of the men who have been trained for our ministry in that institution. Mark you, the words quoted are from the archdeacon's annual address to the "colored" convocation.

Archdeacon Russell says, in part (August number Southern Missioner):

I am sorry, dear brethren, that I have to again remind some of you of the careless, indifferent way in which you render the Church services. I find in some of our churches that the ministers conform to a great extent to the denominations around them, instead of holding up for a true rendition of our beautiful liturgy, and thus attract others to our way. . . . Strange to say, in some places our ministers hold "class meetings" at the regular services, just as they would be conducted in the Methodist Church. And others seldom or never wear their surplices when ministering to certain congregations. Is this right?

Mr. Editor, I hardly think further comment is necessary. The few colored men drawn to our ministry ought to represent the best in character and literary attainments of that race, and certainly their co-education and contact with white men in our large seminaries, well equipped, ought to insure the very best results for themselves, their people, and the Church. Any colored man able to fulfill the canonical literary qualifications ought to be able to do good work in our existing seminaries. Do we not hurt the colored people themselves, as well as injure the Church, when we encourage unfit men for the ministry, by way of these little "colored kindergartens?"

PRESBYTER.

"ANGELICAN," NOT ANGLICAN

To the Editor of The Living Church:

Really, it is too bad, when a poor unfortunate writer tries to poke fun at the compositor of a secular paper through your columns, that your own compositor should reverse the misprint, and so lose the point altogether. I plead not guilty to saying that the expression "Anglican Church" does not describe accurately our Communion. The words I referred to in this manner should have read the "Anglican Church."

Which One?

One of us, dear—

But one—

Will sit by the bed with marvelous fear,
And clasp the hand
Growing cold as it feels for the spirit land—
Darling, which one?

One of us, dear—

But one—

Will stand by the other's coffin bier,
And look and weep,
While those marble lips strange silence keep—
Darling, which one?

One of us, dear—

But one—

By an open grave will drop a tear,
And homeward go,
The anguish of an unshared grief to know—
Darling, which one?

One of us, darling, it must be,
It may be you will slip from me;
Or perhaps my life may first be done;
I'm glad we do not know
Which one.

Pen-and-Ink-lings

SLANG has now become so general as to need dictionaries of its own. Dr. Babbitt, of Columbia University, is preparing a dictionary of college slang, the existing American one not having been revised since 1853. Germany has six such dictionaries. Literature says: "The differentiation of the dialects of Yale and Harvard is believed to be as clearly marked as that of the speech of Georgia and Mississippi negroes."

MR. WALTER H. PAGE has resigned the editorship of The Atlantic Monthly and has accepted an invitation to take a prominent post in the direction of the literary work of the allied houses of Harper & Doubleday-McClure Company. His successor in The Atlantic is Mr. Bliss Perry, well known in literature as an author. Since his graduation from Williams College in 1881, Mr. Perry has been in the department of English, first at Williams, and afterwards at Princeton University, where he was lately appointed to the Holmes Professorship of English Literature.

POKAGON, late chief of the Pottawatamies was a man of great moral strength. His appetites and passions were always under the control of an awakened conscience. There was also something of the woman's tenderness and sweetness in a nature that could be stern when wrongs were to be denounced. He was a poet, orator, and philosopher. In his orations there not infrequently flashed forth much of the fire and impassioned eloquence which for generations had marked the great chieftains of the Algonquins, and which not infrequently suggest the old prophets of Israel when they fearlessly denounced wrong and injustice. With his death there passed from view one of the noblest children of the red race—a man whose life, thought, and deeds proved how closely akin are the noble natures of all races, ages, and times—

The Coming Age.

HAIL storms are of such frequent occurrence in this country, and often do so much damage to crops, etc., that one wonders why no use is made of the mortars employed in Europe to avert these disasters. They are constructed and operated on scientific principles, and are practically successful. If a hail storm is in process of formation, one of these mortars is fired in the neighborhood, and in place of the hail stones, a heavy shower of rain falls. In Styria and Carniola, an Italian agricultural journal of high reputation states, the vineyards defended by mortars have not been injured by hail for the last three years.

A RECENT issue of the Sing Sing Star of Hope, issued by the convicts of the New York prison, contained the following "business chances":

TO EXCHANGE—The advertiser will be glad to exchange a banjo, a mouth organ, a pair of blankets, 47 Moody and Sankey tracts, and three prize sermons by Talmage for a jack-screw, a three-cornered file, and 30 feet of rope. Address DISSATISFIED DICK, Clinton P.

TO EXCHANGE—A person owning a life interest in a small but comfortably furnished apartment in a well lighted, well-ventilated stone building, will exchange the same for a blanket, a yellow dog, and a cave in the side of a hill situated in any desert country on the face of the globe. Address LIFE LARRY, Clinton P.

GOOD BUSINESS OPPORTUNITY—A party having an eight year's stone-cutting contract with the State wishes to relinquish it. Any person may have the same if he can make the proper arrangement with the governor. The contract includes free board, grand music by string and brass band, expert medical attendance, and spiritual care. Must be investigated to be appreciated. Address GOOD THING GEORGE, Clinton P.

"WE have no table talkers now, they say. We are too well-bred to talk. If any one is so unfortunate as to have an idea, he has at least the good grace to turn it into a joke. Then it can take its place with the crabs and olives and other delicacies, comfortably and harmoniously. There is a ripple of laughter, a little nervous chatter, a repatee from the brilliant woman, another ripple and the idea is safely over. Every one breathes more freely. It might so easily have passed into vulgar discussion if they had not been prompt and quick-witted and helpful. . . . If you want to talk—really talk, not bandy words and epigrams—you must dine alone. Never try it at the modern dinner table. Never, as you value the salad and your next invitation."—The Critic.

AN amusing story is told of a patient in one of our London hospitals in whom the sporting instinct was well developed. His ward was visited in the usual course by the surgeon with a retinue of fifteen students. The surgeon described minutely the nature and extent of the disease from which the patient was suffering, then, turning to the first of the students, he asked: "Now, Mr. Sawyer, would you operate on this case?" "No, sir; I think not." One after another the fifteen students gave the same negative answer to the question. "Well, gentlemen," said the surgeon, "I'm sorry to inform you that you are all wrong. I'm going to operate." "Not if I know it," said the invalid. "Fifteen to one agin it. No chance. 'Ere, give me my togs—I'm orf."

THERE is a bright ten-year old youngster in Bangor, Me., whose aunt has a fad of keeping an autograph album. Some appreciative friend wrote upon one page before the name, the quotation beginning: "What is so rare as a day in June?" etc. The young man in question was looking over the book for a place to put his name, and noticed this. The next page was vacant, and he wrote, in the bold, if somewhat scraggly, chirography of youth, the answer as he saw it: "A Chinaman with whiskers," and then signed his name.

LIFE AND DEATH

Stronger than life is death, for all things die.
Stronger than death is life, for death is nought.
Life—what is life? A flash that streaks the sky.
Death—what is death? A name, a haunting thought.
Stronger than life is death for death subdues
Life's flaring torchlight with its argent rays.
Stronger than death is life, for life renews
Through death the firesprings of its vanished days.
Stronger than life is love, for love's warm breath
Kindles and keeps aglow life's myriad fires.
Stronger than death is love, for love through death
Kindles a larger life when life expires.
Life—what is life? Love's foreglow in the skies.
Death—what is death? Love dawning on our eyes.

Notes from "Eaglesnest"

XII.

THE last day of summer is drifting into the autumn haze. The little fleet of white-winged canoes floats lazily eastward to the bay, turning from the gold and crimson of the setting sun, from the quiet harbor and the dreaming shore, to seek the livelier air and rougher sailing of the open lake. The iridescent waters in the west palpitate at the touch of day's drooping wings, and the waves subside to ripples that scarce are heard in whispers on the sand. The tinkle of deftly-handled oars in the pellucid water is attuned to the sweet-toned talk and laughter of young men and maidens who are floating between earth and heaven with hushed hilarity.

Twilight does not linger long. The moonless night comes down, and even the glimmer of stars lends no light to the pathway of the vanishing season. The smoke of the forest fires, during the long drought of August*, has filled the atmosphere with more than a mellow haze. The sky is "ashen and sober," a sombre background upon which the pines are painted with a blackness such as no colorist ever compounded. It is an "impressionist" picture, in which sea and sky and shore are mingled, over-canopied by the inky silhouettes of the forest. But see! The lights kindled by man begin to twinkle from cottage windows. Around the crescent of the harbor, fires of sympathy and social fellowship gleam, green and red and white; and here and there on the shore delighted children shout and clap their hands as the big bonfire leaps up in flame.

The vacation table is placed on the broad veranda of a cottage near the shore, over which the pines of Northern Michigan soar and sing, while the waves keep time in rhythmic monotone. Here I sit till near the "witching time of night"—recline and listen to the voices that the waves lift up and the wind wafts down. Sometimes, as now, songs float across the water, blending with the sweet tones of the guitar; and on clear nights the moon scatters silver and pearls over the water, and floods with quivering light a wide pathway to the horizon.

Fainter grow the lights, and dimmer the sounds, as night nears its meridian, and the smoke cloud grows denser. I am dreamily following them that go down to the sea in ships, thinking how difficult it must be to make port in such a smother, when I am aroused to the reality of danger by the hoarse bellowing of a steam "whistle" near at hand, and a great barge looms up not far from shore, apparently mistaking my red lantern for the pier-head light. I turn out the light and run to the beach, shouting: "Keep her off; starboard your helm!" The engines are stopped, the wheel is whirled, and the huge hulk drifts off to feel her way around the harbor till she finds the dock.

The clock has struck. Summer has gone out in smoke, and autumn enters behind the curtain. Vacation is over, and work begins with the dawning. What shall be its record and result? We enter the cloud, perhaps, with the momentum of the steam barge, and drive on through darkness and the deep to make our port. If we go wrong and mistake the lights, may God put it into the heart of some one to shout the warning: "Starboard your helm!"

The Literature of Snippets

ABOUT eighteen years ago an enterprising editor began, in a very modest way, to issue a weekly collection of extracts "from all the most interesting books, periodicals, and contributors in the world." It is probable that very few, and the inventor of this happy thought least of all, imagined that the seed so unobtrusively sown was destined to be the parent of a harvest of literary docks and darnels absolutely unprecedented in the history of man. The new venture found first hundreds of readers, and then thousands; some ten years ago, its success became notorious, and a host of rivals determined to prove to the original editor that he had no copyright in his idea. A whole tribe of weeklies appeared, each closely imitating the parent journal, each asserting that its intention was "to interest, to elevate, and to amuse." Of these a few have forced their way to the front, and compete with their predecessor in a settled success. Others, in astonishing number, come forth, and run their little course upon the bookstalls and disappear. Every railway station displays them, in multi-colored rank on rank—orange and sage green and dull pink, golden yellow and lead blue and buff—all thronged with advertisements, each for the price of one penny, offering snacks and snippets of instruction, elevation, and amusement.

We believe that the effect of all this gaudy, kaleidoscopic literature on the minds of the generation which is just passing from boyhood to manhood is immense, and, pace Canon Scott-Holland, emphatically bad. Thousands of unformed minds receive no mental discipline but what these scrappy journals supply for a modest penny. You slip your copper coin into the slot, and by a mechanical process you are instructed, elevated, and amused. We are bound to say that we are unable, after a wide, comparative study of these journals, to admit that the three aims of which they boast are carried out to an equal degree. The purpose is, first of all, to amuse at any cost, and to instruct in a strictly secondary degree. To elevate seems entirely neglected; nothing could be less elevating than the whole tendency and character of these papers. We are not sanguine, we confess, that any efforts of ours will stem, for a moment, the tide of emptiness and folly on which this rainbow-colored literature floats and flaunts itself. Here, we are afraid, is a supply which answers more and more to an imperative demand. The production of all this penny-in-the-slot journalism has led to the formation of a large public which not only reads it with avidity, but reads nothing else, and is thereby so demoralized that it loses the power of exercising any intelligent persistence. The snippet journals are educating a vast population into an inability to fix the attention on any subject whatever for more than, say, two minutes at a time.

Our readers, we know, belong to the dwindling minority which does not find its intellectual pastime in these compendiums of scissor-cuttings. We believe, therefore, that a statement, offered without prejudice, of what these penny journals really do present to their myriad subscribers, will not be unwelcome. In the first place, the idea that anything immoral or "improper" is printed in these popular papers is a complete error. The jesting in some of the vulgarer "comic" journals is occasionally rather gross, but nothing could surpass its intensity of moral purpose. The Nonconformist conscience leans back in its padded chair, with a lapful of scraps, in buff and pink and green, and finds not a word or a thought which, in its own vernacular, "could bring a blush to the cheek of a young person." We are tempted to say that the morality of the colored journal is one of its faults, so utterly empty and conventional is it, so indicative of a timid and insincere outlook upon life. In this twilight of the lower middle classes, all the cats are gray. We are willing, however, to commend this decency for what it is worth, and to admit that the absence of any approach to license contrasts favorably with the carnal obsession of the French or Italian newspapers of the same class. When we have said this, our commendation of the so-called "comic" papers must cease. The fun in their illustrations and their text alike is of the poorest, the most monotonous, the most degrading kind, and from week to week, in journal upon journal, the same sort of pictorial practical joke, preposterously violent, recurs over and over again with so amazing a want of freshness, that it is difficult to understand how such jaded merriment can be offered to the youngest subscriber with the faintest hope of awakening a smile.

When we turn to the serious part of these journals, however, we find that what the convinced lover of snippet literature really desires is decorous enough. No joint of information is put upon the table, but there is supplied a bewildering profusion of science tabloids, and dish upon dish of literary mince. Here we find, for instance, in twenty-five lines a complete history and geography of Christmas Island. An essay on training-ships for sailors is finished in twenty-four lines. The biography of a successful Russian engineer is exhaustively treated in twenty-six lines. All information is, in this way, cut down on the Procrustean bed of brevity, and what the nature of it is, is of no consequence, if it is only succinct and short. Hence, in breathless haste we pass from "Remarkable Flags" to the "Newest Fixed Star," and back by the annals of the Pharmaceutical Society to the statistics of heavy football teams. We are informed, in exactly the same style, about "A Gold Mine on the Kaiser's Upper Lip," and about the new satellite of Saturn, while improvements in the cinematograph jostle the ancient dialects of Mexico. The ingenuity shown in rummaging the visible and invisible worlds for the siftings and scrapings of information is really laudable, and we need not reproach the compilers with an accuracy to which they make no claim. Their object, frankly confessed, is to concentrate the attention of idle-minded readers for the shortest practicable space of time.

We have made various experiments as to the amount of time which these journals have decided should be given to each of their snippets. In other words, their business being accurately to gauge the duration of their readers' capacity for concentration, we have taken for granted that they have now discovered it, and have come to the conclusion that the space in which the attention of a reader can be held is not safely to be extended beyond eighty seconds. To read the longest average snippet aloud, and to dwell proportionately on what it purveys, does not, we find, take any longer than this, and the only exceptions to this rule of brevity are the passages of fiction, which demand no attention at all, and the "competitions," which excite the commercial instincts of the reader, and are, without doubt, the mainstay of all these publications.

We propose to take no other feature of snippet literature into consideration to-day. Its brevity is, perhaps, its greatest curse. It is, as we have said, encouraging a vast population of readers to grow up with brains which become fatigued, and hopelessly inattentive, if a mental effort is demanded for more than eighty seconds. It assumes that information is welcome to the mind, but that the modern reader is incapable of pursuing it to its sources, or holding it when it is presented to him. We believe that the old habit of reading standard works in poetry or history or biography is almost extinct among young readers to-day. For the chronicle of the early growth and slow intellectual development of a celebrated character, crude anecdotes are substituted, as in one of the papers now before us, where we are informed, under the head of "literature," that a well-known and much-esteemed author of to-day, "with the proceeds of some blueberries sold to the mother of her future husband, bought the pencil with which her first story was written." This is the fabulous and vulgar trash which takes the place of history and criticism, and this is the full extent to which the editors of these journals can venture to tax the strained attention of their readers with the exhausting topic of "literature."

It is useless to resist these abuses of the printing-press, but we think the nuisance which they cause worth protesting against. Cheaply illustrated, and still more cheaply edited, with scissors and paste instead of independent thought, they are aiding in the mental deterioration of hundreds and thousands of young minds. They weaken the power of the brain in assimilating information, they reduce to a minimum its capacity for retaining and connecting ideas. The only hope we have is that when the whole generation has been fed upon nothing but pap and mince-meat, there will come a revolt against the purveyors of this miserable diet, and that the victims of violent mental indigestion will decide that their children shall, at least, not be fed upon the trash which was supplied to them. But they will not be able to concentrate their attention on their sufferings for more than eighty seconds at most, and this is hardly a long enough time to determine upon a plan of revolution.—The Saturday Review.

Lady Louisa Stuart Selections from Her Manuscripts. Edited by Hon. James Howe. New York: Harper & Bros. 1899. Price, $2.

When one looks at the striking portrait sketch of "Lady Louisa Stuart in Her 94th Year," which is the attractive frontispiece of this volume, one is prepared to find much that is interesting in the ensuing pages; and one is not disappointed. Lady Louisa Stuart was born in 1757, and died in 1851. What a reach of eventful years is covered by such a life! In these pages one sees the evidence of a genial, thoughtful, womanly nature. The writer, for doubtless she would herself decry the name of author, from her earliest years, possessed keen powers of observation, and soon developed within herself the ability to record her impressions. This she had done through all her long life, but never permitted herself to appear in print before the public. To a lady in her high position such a condition of publicity would be abhorrent. Now that she has gone from this life, it has been thought well to gratify other than her own immediate circle of friends, by printing these selections. They contain "Some Account of John, Duke of Argyll, and His Family"; "Notes" to the "Fairies' Frolic" and "The Diamond Robe," also the "History of the Fortunate Youth," and several unpublished letters of Sir Walter Scott. Through all these there runs a splendid vein of healthy humor; a high feeling for that which is really noble, and that kindly common-sense, which with such a combination of high-toned spirit is always attractive. The Lady Louisa never married, but there is not the suspicion even, of angularity or vinegar. She is good and jolly through all her life. She laughs heartily, possibly even loudly, also. She speaks very plainly at times, as a lady may, on occasion. Somehow one feels as if Thackeray might have known her, and learned from her clear pen how to set down the foibles and vanities of humanity, and do it all with a smile.

One can follow her through her child-life, with her aged parents, in the seclusion which is unlike any other seclusion—that of an English mansion and an English park. Then into that old London of the Georges, which did not attract her much, but from which came to her friend after friend, to tell her of all its happenings. It is to this power of attracting others to her that we are indebted for all that these memoirs contain. None but a genial soul could thus constantly attract, and by this attraction keep ever young, even unto the long drawn term of ninety and four years. The book will be read over and over again by those who are fortunate enough to read it once.

As a specimen of her acute observation, her genial and true spirit, let us hear what this dear old lady in her life of singleness has to say upon womanly nature and affection. She is referring to an expression which Pericles used as an admonition to the women of Athens, when, in an oration, he thus alludes to them: "The less that is said of you, the less that is heard of you, the better for you." Lady Stuart confesses that this saying seemed to her "harsh, affronting, illiberal, savoring of barbarism, and dictated by prejudice, if not by jealousy." "So," she says, "every woman who joins a high spirit to some degree of self-conceit will probably think it while on the bright side of twenty-one. But what was thus indignantly repelled made itself remembered, it could not be got rid of. And why? Because it was grounded on truth. It is surely a misfortune to women to be rendered conspicuous even without their own consent, as in the case of transcendent personal beauty, or a high and responsible situation. But if a woman labors to attain the dangerous pinnacle of power, fame, fashion, or any other species of distinction, she will find reason to pronounce the Athenian statesman not only a sage but a prophet." For all this, however, Lady Louisa Stuart gives full scope to woman's affection. She thus writes on that subject, in continuation of the foregoing: "Madame de Stael has justly said that love is but an episode (she might have added an insignificant one) in the life of a man; the whole poem, the main story, in that of a woman. And whether it be love, commonly so-called, or friendship, or maternal, or filial, or sisterly affection, no one can deny that some affection, something belonging to the heart, influences female conduct far more than male. I do not say this in censure of men. But such as men and women were created, such, I presume, is (in a certain sense) what they ought to be. 'Why has not man a microscopic eye? For this plain reason—man is not a fly.' Why has not he (generally speaking) feelings that melt his resolution, impede his exertion, weaken his reason, combat his interest, overpower his prudence? For this plain reason—he is not a woman. Were it otherwise, how could the business of the world be carried on? How a single step be taken in public life?"

Thus Lady Stuart writes out of her own heart, and with rare good sense.

There are some delightful letters from Sir Walter Scott also in the volume, which have never before been printed. We see in them how genially and philosophically the great author of the Waverley novels took the reverses in his fortune, and set himself manfully to work with mind and pen. These few letters bring vividly before one the library at Abbotsford and its genial occupant, noble at all times, whether in the full flush of fame and fortune, or under the cloud of a lowering adversity.

We can promise to all readers of selections from Lady Louisa Stuart's manuscripts at last put into print, a really enjoyable time in their perusal.

Sermons, Biographical and Miscellaneous. By the late Benjamin Jowett, M.A., Master of Balliol College. Edited by the Very Rev. W. H. Freeman, M.A., Dean of Ripon. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co. 1899. Price, $2.50.

This interesting volume contains nineteen sermons, which reflect the well known amiability and broad mindedness of the famous Master of Balliol. No one can read these learned dissertations, without being better for the exercise. The smiling, genial scholar takes you along with him, and you find him pleasant company. You may not agree with him, but his differences are so natural to himself, and so well put, that you never think of leaving him until the journey is ended. In these charming excursions you are introduced to John Wycliffe, and following him comes Ignatius Loyola; you have also for companions Richard Baxter, Blaise Pascal, John Wesley, Dean Stanley, Canon Hugh Pearson, and Professors Henry Smith and T. H. Green. These all come singly, but there are curious relations also, in which John Bunyan and Benedict Spinoza are joked together; and Leon Gambetta and Archbishop Tait walked side by side. But there is nothing incongruous in all this. The range of men and the range of subjects in the miscellaneous sermons reveal a man of wide and varied sympathies. He has a genial outlook upon both the Church and the world, and will not assume a pessimistic view about anything whatever. Perhaps these two extracts will serve as good examples of style, temper, and matter:

Faith, without knowledge, is a willful and unmeaning thing, which can never guide men into light and truth. It will pervert their notion of God; it will transfer them from one religion to another: it may, and often has, undermined their sense of right and wrong. It has no experience of life or of history no power of understanding or foreseeing the nature of the struggle which is going on in the human heart, or the movements which affect Churches, and which, as ecclesiastical history shows, always have been, and will be again. It is apt to rest on some misapplied quotation from Scripture, and to claim for its own creed, theories, and fancies, the authority of inspiration.

But then, again, knowledge without faith is feeble and powerless, unsuited to our condition in this world, supplying no sufficient motive for human action. It is apt to sink into isolation and selfishness, and seems rather to detach us from God and our fellow-men than to unite us to them. It is likely to pass into a cold and sceptical temper of mind, which sees only the difficulties that surround us, and thinks that one thing is as good as another, and that nothing in this world signifies.

The last sermon but one in the book was preached to the servants at Balliol. A few lines will give a pleasing glimpse of such relationship. And the minuteness of the detail recalls the quaintness of our own Dr. Houghton, in his addresses to his St. Anna's Guild

The servants, too, must help their masters in maintaining order and regularity in the household. They must keep up its character for hospitality. They are part of the family, and also, if they deserve to be so, in a measure the friends of his friends. They are not serving for him, but for the sense of duty, for the love of God. There is one thing which it may seem almost vulgar to mention; it is cleanliness. Cleanliness, it has been said, is next to godliness; and it is impossible to exaggerate the importance of it to health, to good looks, to the fairness and growth of everybody and everything. All persons should be alike scrupulous about it, for it has an effect upon the mind, and is itself the mark of a superior mind. Let it be admitted also that it causes a great deal of trouble, and that there are many excuses for neglecting it.

Even in this extract on such a commonplace subject, the genial nature of Jowett comes out. What a fine touch that is when speaking of cleanliness, he says, "it is itself the mark of a superior mind"; and how full of sympathy the admission "that it causes a great deal of trouble, and there are many excuses for neglecting it."

The Bi-Centennial of the Founding of the First Baptist Church of the City of Philadelphia, 1698-1898 Edited by William Williams Skeen, M.D., LL.D. Philadelphia: American Baptist Publication Society.

This portly volume will of course be of primary interest to the congregation of the "First Baptist Church," but it also has a value as the record of a long course of earnest Christian work, and in its earlier portion throws some interesting side lights upon the history of religious development in Philadelphia. Appendix D contains the Baptist indictment of the Church of England in a letter to the Rev. Mr. Clayton, rector of Christ Church, who took the new congregation to task in the spring of 1698, for their act of schism. The letter must have opened his eyes to the fact that in dealings of this kind there is no short and easy method. He was required to give Scriptural authority for everything in the Church of England as it then existed, from archbishops down to organists, vergers and singing boys, as also for every service of the Prayer Book in all its details. If he had been a man of humour and resource, he might have answered by a similar demand, and thus have approached a basis of discussion. But he seems to have dropped the matter without further notice. The contents of the book include an historical sketch by the editor, biographies of the successive pastors, addresses by several prominent ministers, the programme of the celebration, and histories of the organizations connected with the society. To these are added fifteen appendices on special subjects of interest. There are a number of well executed engravings. The whole forms a handsome volume of over five hundred pages.

Reminiscences of the Santiago Campaign. By Captain John Bigelow. U. S. A. With a Map. New York: Harper and Bros. 1899. Price, $1.25.

This is a manly recital of adventures in Cuba during the late hostilities there, and a current criticism upon the whys and wherefores of some disagreeable happenings. All is done by a gentlemanly hand, and with a frankness which is never insinuating or abusive. In the preface our author states the purport of his book in these words: "The enlisting, organizing, drilling, and equipping of an army of over two hundred and fifty thousand men, the transportation of about twenty thousand of them to a theatre of war a thousand miles or more distant, and from a temperate to a tropical climate, on less than one month's notice for preparation, involved endless confusion, and an almost total disregard of the rules and precautions of scientific warfare. In this narration I have not sought to give undue prominence to, still less to disguise, any of the consequences of this want of preparation. On the contrary, if what I have to report can have any value, professionally, or otherwise, and I hope it will be found to have some, it must consist mainly in the frank disclosure of everything that fell under my personal observation, the recurrence of which our government in the future should strive to avoid." The honesty and honor that pervade all that Capt. Bigelow has written, may be inferred from what he is courageous enough to say of himself when under fire: "At the first volley, being entirely unprepared for it, I ducked my head involuntarily, and felt as if I must or ought to be hit. On realizing that I was not, I was pleased to observe that no one seemed to have noticed me. I am pretty sure that nobody did. Every one was doubtless absorbed just then in his own sensations and deportment. After that I did not attempt to dodge bullets, though I repeatedly sought shelter from them." The incidental mention of wounds and suffering and death, told in the most matter of fact way in these pages, helps one to realize somewhat of the horrors of war.

The Gospel for a World of Sin. A Companion Volume to "The Gospel for an Age of Doubt." By Henry Van Dyke, D.D. New York: The Macmillan Company. 1899.

Dr. Van Dyke has given to the world one of the most eloquent, persuasive, and comprehensive presentations of the Gospel of Atonement through the Precious Blood of Christ, that has appeared in any age. He has grasped the broad idea of the Atonement as a fact so many-sided that it defies definition; as a power so persuasive and transforming that it can be expressed only in a life. There are many passages of remarkable force and beauty in this book. The author writes from his heart even more than from his head, and both are full of the clear, pure light of everlasting, divine truth which streams from the Cross of the Redeemer of the world. We do not see how any serious person can read this book without catching the inspiration of it, and being helped by it to higher living. It is a strong plea for the Gospel of Divine Love as the only cure for the evils which abound in a world of sin.

Thoughts on the Collects for the Trinity Season. By Ethel Romanes. New York: Longmans, Green & Co. Pp. 298. Price, $1.

This dainty little book, in green and gold, is a distinct addition to our devotional literature. It is designed to help those who wish to keep up the practice of devout meditation, but to whom, for lack of time or training, more elaborate books of formal meditations are not helpful. Each of the collects is broken up into half a dozen paragraphs, which furnish food for practical contemplation for as many days of the week. Thus the rich stores of devotional meaning contained in the collects of the Prayer Book are made available and distributed throughout the week. The idea is an excellent one, and is well worked out. The tone of the meditations is thoroughly healthy, and the book cannot fail to be helpful to any thoughtful person. The treatment of the Saints' Days of Trinitytide is particularly good.

Pabo, the Priest. A Novel. By S. Barrington-Gould. New York: Frederick A. Stokes Company. Price, 50 cts.

Our readers will take it for granted that any work from the pen of Mr. Barrington-Gould must be well written and full of interest. This story is no exception to the rule. It is a story of the struggles of the Welsh for the freedom of their Church in the reign of Henry I of England. It is full of historical incidents and allusions, and the devotion of the people to their priest-chief is full of the spirit of the martyrs of early days. The story ends with deliverance from oppression, and the restoration of the rights of the people.

Cromwell's Own. By Author Paterson. New York and London: Harper & Bros. Price, $1.50

As the title would indicate, this is a story of the Rebellion or the Revolution in Charles I's time. You call it one name or the other, according to your lights and beliefs. The hero is a Unitarian, though why he is one, except that his father was one, is not told. A Unitarian in those times was considered by both Royalist and Roundhead as being as near a devil as a man could be, and so the hero gets more kicks than hapence from all sides. He is tough, however, and gets along with it all, and slips his neck out of a halter and rides off to his lady love, Cromwell's ward. His rival, Cromwell's son, dies in the nick of time, and Cromwell who ought to curse the Unitarian, feels, like Balaam, constrained to bless, so they marry. It is a mildly interesting story, but does not tell much about Cromwell.

The Garden of Swords. By Max Pemberton. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co. Price, $1.50.

A sad story, and yet one that arrests the attention from the very beginning. The title is very mysterious, but it means that lovely garden of France, Alsace Lorraine, which indeed became a Garden of Swords in the Franco Prussian War. The scene is laid in and around Worth and at Strasburg, and the gruesome terrors of the siege of that fair city are depicted in vivid colors. The love story that winds in and out through bursting bombs and burning villas, has one or two very dramatic chapters in it. The style is full of animation, and the interest never flags. The author is no "prentice hand," and the book is fully up to the standard the public has set for him.

CHARLOTTE M. YONGE's new story this year is entitled "The Herd Boy and His Hermit," and is historical in its setting. Mr. Thomas Whittaker will publish the book about the middle of September.

MR. THOMAS WHITTAKER will soon bring out a second series of "The Chief Things," by the Rev. A. W. Snyder. The first series was published some ten years ago, and is now in its fifth edition. The new volume will discuss the fundamentals of the Faith, under such heads as The Necessity of Belief; Of Belief in God; Atheism; Agnosticism; Revelation; The Christ; Christianity; Inspiration; The Bible; How to Read the Bible, etc., in such a way that any man can understand. The popularity of the first will make a good sale for the second series.

Opinions of the Press

INGERSOLL'S CAREER.—Mr. Ingersoll was one of the few infidels whom this country has produced. In fact, he is about the only one who has won notoriety, and the only one who has traded on his unbelief. Thomas Paine was a deist who earned immortality by his services as a patriot, as a trenchant pamphleteer. Voltaire profoundly influenced the political history of France, and still shapes somewhat its current popular philosophy of life, if not its metaphysical speculation, and he must ever be reckoned with as one of the masters of French prose and verse. But no such fame awaits Mr. Ingersoll when our children's children study either the history, the literature, or the philosophy of the period in which he lived. . . . He was a Don Quixote tilting at wind-mills. He was a bold assailant of views, which, however much they obtain among the illiterate and superstitious, no longer obtain among intelligent, rational men.

The Saturday Review

THE ARCHBISHOPS' DECISION.—All the arguments for the ceremonial use of incense, and the carrying of lights in procession as catholic and edifying practices, remain absolutely unaffected by the legal prohibition pronounced by the primates. The fanatics who denounce every unfamiliar rite as superstitious or idolatrous, will find little satisfaction in this judgment. So far is incense from being condemned as evil, that "even now the liturgical use of incense is not by law permanently excluded from the Church's ritual." If the ecclesiastical atmosphere were less heated, the archbishop suggests that this latent authority might even now be used. "Many things might become probable when our toleration of one another has risen to a higher level, which are not probable at present." Only one thing can give the Archbishops' decisions the character of a Protestant triumph, and that is the disobedience of the ritualist clergy. It is indeed very difficult to see how disobedience could be excused. It is certain that no weightier confirmation could be given to the popular charge against the Ritualists that they are essentially lawless, following no better authority than their own preferences. We would earnestly press on the clergy concerned to consider calmly the position in which they are placed.

The Spectator

Those who throughout the present troubles and discontents in the Church have held fast to the belief that the Court of the Archbishops would prove a tribunal competent to provide the necessary discipline for the Church, may fairly feel their faith justified by the admirable decision given on Monday in regard to the liturgical use of incense and the carrying of lighted candles in processions. Nothing could have been wiser, more moderate, and yet firmer in tone, and, in a word, more eminently judicial, than the judgment read by the Archbishop of Canterbury. That the decision will be obeyed even by the most extreme Ritualists, we can not doubt. To think otherwise is to assume that the men who lay most stress upon episcopal authority, and whose whole theory of Church government and discipline is based on the right of the bishops to direct the Church, are willing to flout that authority and to declare that they will only obey when decisions are consonant with their own particular theories. But that would be pure anarchy, and anarchy of a kind which should be specially odious to the advanced High Churchmen.

The Christian Advocate (Methodist)

CHRISTIAN VOWS.—So far as our Church is concerned, a man is bound to it only by his vows. If in good standing, he may withdraw at any time without injury to the cause, or any reflection on his own good name. But so long as he claims a place in it and is under its protection, he is bound to observe his promises or suffer as a transgressor. An applicant coming to the altar of the Church "solemnly, in the presence of God and the congregation, ratifies and confirms the promise and vow of repentance, faith, and obedience, contained in the baptismal covenant." This covenant binds him to faith in the Holy Scriptures, and a life of consecration to God's service; to "renounce the devil and all his works, the vain pomp and glory of the world, with all covetous desires of the same, and the carnal desires of the flesh," so as not to "follow or be led by them." This is specifically a vow to God, by which the applicant publicly separates himself from the world and sanctifies himself to the divine service—a vow taken not as an experiment, nor for a limited period, but for all time. It cannot be recalled nor broken without treason and desertion. "There is no discharge in this war."

The Household

A Cabin in the Woods

JOHN BURROUGHS, AS INTERVIEWED BY CLIFTON JOHNSON

(CONCLUDED)

"Afternoons I always walk through the woods or help the men I hire with the work. Just a little back in the woods is a stream—Black Creek, we call it. It's very picturesque and very wild. For two miles it winds through the forest, and the tall trees on each side are reflected in the quiet water. I have a boat on it, and my dog and I often go over here and have a row. I go there in April to hear the pine warblers and the water-thrushes. At the same time I see flocks of rusty blackbirds. They collect there in troops and have their concerts. They are quite tame, and let me row by so close I can see their yellow eyes. Now and then I catch a glimpse of a muskrat or a mink.

"In the immediate neighborhood of Slab-sides, at this season, I hear the scarlet tanager every day. It is a wood bird, and does not go down into the cultivated land along the Hudson. The rose-breasted grosbeak is in song now, with its rich soft, warble, and so is the oven-bird. I like to watch the latter launch into the air. Often, it will go up to a height of a hundred feet, and then it bursts into song, and descends—just as if it were a rocket—first a vigorous upward flight, then an explosion of song high in air, then the gentle drift back to earth.

"In the evening I hear the piping of the wood frog, the leopard frog, the bull-frog and, best of all, the song of the toad. The toad's song is a guttural sort of music, but to me it is very sweet. The old toad, while it vocalizes, sits half-body deep in the water, and its song is one of thankfulness and good will. The sound is like the purring of the genii of the twilight. I wish some poet would put the song of the toad into his verses.

"The only other animal sounds at night are the voices of the owls and whippoorwills. A while ago, though, I did hear a strange whistling. It was shrill and high-pitched, and I couldn't account for it. I rather suspect it was a coon, but I'm not sure.

"Recently, a story circulated that we had some wild 'varmint' here in the woods. It was said it had killed a horse in one place, fought with dogs in another, maimed a calf in another. It was the talk of all the region for ten days or two weeks, and many people really believed some animal that had escaped from a menagerie was roaming about. The woods were avoided by the timid—but there was nothing to it. People seem to have a thirst for that sort of thing, and to crave it as a sauce for the prose of their daily events, and the story grows wonderfully when it once gets started.

"The whippoorwills began to pipe this year April 16th, but they were not in full song till the end of the month. They come very close to the house, and I hear some notes from them that would be strange to the ears of some people. Before they make any other sound, they 'puit, tuit,' just like a turkey. Then follows a preliminary cluck, and lastly they break into the familiar cry that gives them their name. The whippoorwill makes its nest on the ground and, as it sits there, it in color and streaking is so like a piece of bark and so blends itself with its surroundings, that you never would see it if it did not start up before you. The bird is up and off like some great moth or bat. It has a very silent flight, and makes no sound whatever—no more than if it were a shadow. Like all nocturnal birds, its web of feathers is very downy and much softer than that of the day birds. In the case of the owls that want to steal on their prey, this is a great help, but the whippoorwill feeds on insects, and I don't understand why they should be so noiseless.

"I often hear the little whinny of the screech owls, and the cry of the hoot owls off in the woods. One day I had a friend here who could imitate the calls of a great many birds and animals exactly. While we were out walking we sat down under a tree and he gave the hoot of an owl. Two crows appeared on the scene instantly. The owls eat the crows' eggs, and if the crows hear an owl hoot in the daytime, they all go and have a great powwow. They make such a noise, that the owl wishes himself almost anywhere else. So these two crows, when they heard that call, thought they had caught one of the robbers. 'Come on boys, here's fun!' they cried, and were after him at once. But when they saw us they were sharp enough to see how the land lay, and they got out of there lively.

"My friend hooted again, and in a minute or two an owl came and lit on the tree about us and sat there looking down with his great round eyes. All he saw was these two featherless owls sitting there at the foot of the tree laughing at him. But he wouldn't believe he was fooled, and sat there grumbling at us till we went away.

"The noblest of all the birds that comes within view of my clearing is the eagle. Think of getting up in the morning and looking out of your window and seeing an eagle perched in plain sight. I do that frequently. I saw him within a day or two up on that dead tree at the top of the mountain. He looked as big as a turkey, and he was near enough so that I could see his white head. He sat there a long time preening his plumage. I saw him there a year ago, and I call his perch the 'eagle tree.' It is a big hemlock that has been struck by lightning. A great many trees about here have been lightning struck. One that I was looking at recently was a large oak. The tree had been blown to pieces as if by an explosion of dynamite. Great slivers like rails were scattered all through the

"I have the partridges about me all through the year. They are never in the clearing, but I saw one fly across one day. They begin to drum the last of April. When I was a little fellow I tried to steal up to one to see how he did it. I crept and crept along until I almost wore my pants out, and just as I got within a rod of the bird, it looked over the log it was behind—'he! he! he!'—laughing at me as much as to say: 'Go home now, little boy; you've seen a partridge.' I don't know how the creature heard me. I didn't crack a twig or make a sound. Perhaps he smelled me. I was disappointed, but I said: 'I'll see you yet,' and I have seen partridges drum a number of times since. It used to be thought that the bird beat its wings on a log or hit them together over its back. What it really does is to inflate its breast and thump it with its wings faster and faster till the sound runs into a low roll. It is a call to the female—the partridge's way of wooing. As he drums, he stands very straight and struts about with his tail wide-spread dragging on the ground.

"Things are of course comparatively quiet here in the winter, but there are the chickadees, the woodpeckers, bluejays and crows; and sometimes the hounds will drive a fox across the clearing right in front of the house. Last year I had a woodchuck just over the way at the foot of the cliff, but he didn't seem to like my company and he dug out. I'd see him nibbling the leaves and he'd sometimes nibble the celery. We threatened to dispatch him for that, and it

"The most soothing thing that I know of is the sea, and next to that the face of a scarred cliff. I know how impressed I have been with the stony tops of the Adirondack mountains. The composure of their rocks was like the face of God Almighty. What venerableness, what power, what repose! It was grandeur unspeakable.

"There's nothing in any city that touches me that way. No, for me, real living is to be among the rocks, the hills, the trees, and the life of nature as you see it in the country and in the forests. It is that instinct made me build Slabsides, and here I stay and see my days go by. I sit here and watch them go. Some of them are bright, some of them are dun-colored, and some are black. But on the whole I have a pretty good time. —The Interior.

Thoroughly Puzzled

THE contemporaries of Gilbert Stuart praise, not only his portraits, but his conversation, which excelled in apt phrases, liveliness of expression, and in humor. Once while in England he was traveling in a stage-coach with several gentlemen, strangers to him, but sociable and full of good spirits. They became so interested in their fellow-passenger's talk that they were curious to know who and what he was.

One of them put a roundabout question to find out the stranger's calling, and Stuart answered that he sometimes dressed gentlemen's and ladies' hair.

"You are a hair-dresser, then?"

"What?" exclaimed Stuart. "Do you take me for a barber?"

"I beg your pardon, sir, but I inferred it from what you said. May I take the liberty to ask what you are?"

"Why, I sometimes brush a gentleman's coat or hat, and sometimes adjust a cravat."

"Oh, you are a valet, then, to some nobleman?"

"A valet! Indeed, I am not! I am not a servant! To be sure, I make coats and waistcoats for gentlemen."

"Oh, you are a tailor!"

Tailor! Do I look like a tailor? I never handled a goose other than a roasted one."

By this time the passengers were roaring with laughter, and one said:

"What, then, are you?"

"I'll tell you," answered Stuart. "I dress hair, brush hats and coats, adjust a cravat, make coats, waistcoats, and breeches, and likewise boots and shoes."

"Oho! a boot and shoemaker, after all!"

"Guess again, gentlemen! I never handled boot or shoe but for my own feet, yet all I have told you is true."

"We may as well give up guessing," and again there was a burst of laughter.

"Now, gentlemen, I will not play the fool with you any longer. I get my bread by making faces," said Stuart, so screwing his face that the passengers shook with merriment.

"Ah! you are a comedian?"

I never was on the stage," said Stuart, as the stage drove up to its stopping place, where the passengers separated.

"Gentlemen," said Stuart, "all that I have said of my various employments is included in these words: I am a portrait painter. If you will call on me, I shall be ready to brush you a coat or hat, dress your hair, accommodate you with boots or shoes, give you ruffles or cravats, and make faces for you." —Youth's Companion.

Sanitary Conditions in Schools

BY H. A. THOMAS, M.D.

IT is no small encouragement to a hygienic publication to have brought home to it irrefutable evidence of the fact that it has been accomplishing one of the objects which, at different periods in its career, it has set before itself. Not long ago the American Journal of Health resolved to arouse the attention of parents to the importance of hygienic conditions in connection with boarding schools and colleges. And it is with a feeling of pride that it now receives, every day, letters from parents throughout the length and breadth of the land, containing the most anxious inquiries in regard to the sanitary surroundings of different institutions of education. Not only in this respect is evidence given of the work we have been pushing forward; but another and a more substantial was afforded our representatives, who visited many of the schools and colleges throughout the land, in the shape of the high sanitary standard maintained in many of these establishments.

One of the most prominent in bestowing special attention on matters relating to the maintenance and promotion of physical welfare was found to be St. Mary's School, of Knoxville, Ill. Here the object which the management seemed to have set before themselves is the development—not of either the mind or the body, one to the exclusion of the other—but of both mind and body in harmony. While the standard of scholarship maintained is of the very highest order, one looks in vain for any of the processes of "cramming" the pupil with un-

THE DISTINGUISHING CHARACTERISTIC OF THE VOCALION IS ITS EXQUISITE TONE

ORGANS BUILT on the Vocalion system are pre-eminently fitted for church services. They have a full, rich, diapason tone and a peculiar delicacy in the string registers, which make them of inestimable value as an accompaniment to the human voice.

The method of tone production is radically different from all others. It gives the pitch as a fixed quality, free reeds being used for the purpose. In connection with each reed there is a pipe or chamber through which the tone passes and which determines its quality. By this means the reed is given a smooth, fluty quality of tone as well as resonance and remarkable power.

The distinctive features of the Vocalion are

Tonal superiority;
Compactness of form in proportion to capacity.
Variety of registration;
And price.

We wish to call the attention of all church societies contemplating the purchase of an organ to our Style 22, a full description of which we shall be glad to furnish upon application. Send for Catalogue G.

Vocalions range in price from $275 upward.

digested learning, which so often break down the health and so seldom benefit the mind. At this institution the student is furnished with all the knowledge that she can be expected thoroughly to assimilate. This does not endanger her physical welfare—on the contrary, a given amount of wholesome thinking is most salutary to bodily health, and at the same time, it affords the maximum of mental development. But the latter subject is not within the range of our investigation; and we do not mean to touch upon it, except in so far as it has a direct and positive effect on health. Accordingly, we shall confine our attention, hereafter, to conditions which appeal immediately to the body. First, under this head, we wish to call attention to the facts regarding sanitation at St. Mary's school. Inasmuch as the information which we contribute was gathered from the personal observation of a member of our hygienic staff, it may be received as authoritative. Having gone to the trouble and expense of sending out representatives to different parts of the country (in answer to the numerous inquiries made of us), in order to ascertain conditions with regard to health then prevalent, we feel that it is no more than simple justice that we should claim for our opinions, respecting any institution we have visited, the weight that is due to first hand knowledge as opposed to hearsay. It is in this spirit that we call attention to the sanitary arrangements in connection with St. Mary's School. Here sanitation is managed on a strictly sanitary basis. The toilet facilities are up to date in every particular in which the preservation of health is concerned. The foundations of the buildings are entirely underdrained, drain tile was carried around the outside as the concrete was laid, so that no water can seep under any portion of the building. All soil pipes and sink pipes run down an outside wall and are carried directly out, not a foot of sewer being under the floor. In the matter of ventilation, the system adopted is such as to insure the free circulation at all times, of pure, fresh air to all parts of the buildings, including both class rooms and sleeping apartments. The building is in the form of a letter E turned on the side, the open court facing south; and no part of it is more than forty feet wide, thus insuring the greatest amount of sunlight and readiness of ventilation. The arrangements which have been made in connection with the light supplied to the recitation and study rooms at St. Mary's School are especially worthy of admiration. The adjustments are so regulated that an ample and steady light is secured during study hours, yet the light is never so strong as to impose a strain upon the eyesight. Certainly, this institution has, in this as well as in other respects, proved itself to be a model worthy of imitation.

For the systematic and carefully directed physical culture of the girls in its care, St. Mary's school has a well equipped gymnasium. In it is found the special developing apparatus of Dr. D. A. Sargent, of Harvard University, consisting of chest weights, rowing machine, chest expander, chest developer, bridge, low and high pulleys, bars, rings, clubs, dumb bells, etc.

The work is conducted according to the Sargent methods, which are used in the leading colleges of the country. Each pupil is given a thorough physical examination by the director of the gymnasium, measurements are taken; the strength of the back, legs, chest and arms is ascertained; these are recorded, so that changes in strength and development may be noted. An individual prescription is made out for each pupil, the purpose of which is to develop and strengthen her along the lines of greatest need, as shown by her physical examination. For example, if a girl has a hollow chest and poor lung capacity, she will be given work on the chest expander, or if her head is forward and her carriage poor, she will have the bridle prescribed for use a certain number of times each day.

Physicians appreciate the value of the individual prescriptions, and are glad to send their patients into a gymnasium for work, when they would not allow it were the work competitive in spirit, or of a violent nature. In addition to individual work, class work is done, consisting in marching, free movements, and work with dumb bells, Indian clubs, wands, bean-bags, ladders, bars and rings, giving much variety and interest to the exercise.

In case pupils are not sufficiently strong to take the regular work, special arrangements are made whereby they can do their individual work with rest between the exercises, at especially appointed hours.

All these features combine to render St. Mary's School eminently worthy of hygienic approbation, and for such reasons it receives the editorial endorsement of the American Journal of Health.—From American Journal of Health.

A SHORT time ago a man died in Brussels leaving nearly his entire fortune to a young woman who was entirely unacquainted with him. This is how it came to pass. He was a very eccentric man, and set out, like Diogenes, in search of an honest man. His tub was an omnibus, and his lantern a small coin.

In the omnibus he took his seat every day near the conductor, and always showed himself very obliging in passing up the money of passengers, and returning the change; but to the latter he always managed to add a franc or a half-franc. Then he would watch those to whom it came. They would count it carefully, notice the extra coin, and invariably slip it into their pockets. No one thought of the poor conductor whose meager salary of only three francs a day could ill support such a loss.

But at last a young woman passed here back, with: "Conductor, you have given me half a franc too much." Diogenes, delighted, followed her home, made inquiries, and as the answers were satisfactory, made his will in her favor; though he never gave her warning that her half-franc was going to bring her half a million sterling.—The Columbian.

Children's Hour

Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations,
That is known as the Children's hour.

The Shabby Stranger

ONE bright, crisp autumn morning a little girl went skipping along the sunny pathway that led from the kitchen door to the garden gate, and as she went she dragged behind her an old potato basket. Near the gate she stopped, and reaching down into the basket, she lifted out a wee black kitten; then turning the old potato basket topsy-turvy, she sat down upon it and cuddled the kitten in her arms.

"You're a dear little kitty," she said. "Do you know it? You're a smart little kitty, too, but I'm a great deal smarter. I made a dough-cake this morning, and I sweetened it and spiced it and baked it all myself. Could you do that? Of course not!" and the child laughed at the very idea of such a thing. "Oa, my! I can do ever so many nice things."

Yes, she could, that is true, and she did. She did a great deal for a little girl of her age; but dear, sweet child that she was, Marjory Arnold was much too fond of boasting of her own good deeds and accomplishments, and she had a habit of tossing her head and looking wonderfully self-important.

The kitten apparently was not overawed by the presence of so capable a personage, for a crimson leaf fluttering down from a lovely maple tree near by caught his eye, and he jumped from Marjory's arms, and began to cut pretty capers about her feet. Marjory's merry laugh rang out on the clear autumn air, as leaf after leaf, red, yellow, and speckled green, fell upon the pathway, and the nimble kitten twisted himself into the funniest shapes and postures as he sprang after each new arrival. Then the kitten grew tired all of a sudden, as kittens have a way of doing, and he laid himself down like a soft, black ball, just where he chanced to be.

"Well, well!" said Marjory, and she stooped and picked him up. She nestled him cosily against the folds of her pretty red coat, and taking a dainty white handkerchief from her pocket, she covered him all up but his head, and then smiled fondly at his comical little black face as he slept.

Marjory's Arnold's home, although a city home, stood somewhat apart from the din and noise and bustle of the city, in the midst of a very lovely garden. This garden, with its grand old trees, its well-kept grass, and its great variety of choice flowers, was the little girl's delight, and from the time the hyacinths and the tulips and the crocuses first showed their tiny heads in the early spring, till the last beautiful stately chrysanthemum had been plucked from its stem, she loved to be in it—a fair flower among flowers.

As she sat upon the old potato basket in the warm, mellow autumn sunshine, she leaned forward and tenderly caressed one lovely yellow chrysanthemum that grew close beside her; and as she did so, her eye caught sight of a bright blue something that lay in the pathway.

"H'm!" she said to herself as she picked it up. "Here's the needle book I made for Bridget, 'cause she's always losing her needles. Guess I pulled it out of my pocket with my handkerchief. Well, kitty," she said aloud, "I wonder what you'd think of this? This is something else that I can do. I'm sure, you young Sleepy Head, you ought to be a very proud kitten to have such a smart little mistress and to live in this lovely garden." And feeling most tremendously self-important, she tossed her head and cast an admiring glance about her.

As she looked toward the garden gate, she saw a shabby little stranger standing there. His clothes were ragged and his hands were none too clean, and his faded cap rested on the back of a rather tumbled head. His hands were thrust deep into his trousers pockets, and he was leaning with his right shoulder pressed hard against the gate, and straight into the garden he was gazing with wide open eyes.

"You can't come in!" said self-satisfied Marjory.

"Don't want ter!" said the boy.

"Well, anyhow," said Marjory, as though she felt sorry for her proud and hasty speech, "I can't open the gate 'cause the handle's too high for me to reach. I'm not very big, you see."

"Oh, I could climb that," said he.

"Well, don't you!" said she. "My papa doesn't allow ragamuffins in the garden, 'cept he's here his own self."

"I ain't a ragamuffin," said the boy.

Little Marjory bent her head over the sleeping kitten, but now and then she stole a shy glance up at the stranger, and each time found him looking wistfully at her.

"Gimme one o' them chrysanth'ums?" he asked, nodding toward the bush of yellow beauties.

The wee black kitten was immediately disturbed from his morning nap and lodged upon the potato basket, as Marjory hastened to grant the boy's request. A fair, soft, fringed beauty was plucked from the bush, and Marjory's dainty fingers passed it through the iron garden gate and laid it in the boy's thin hand.

"Now, you come again to-morrow morning at 'zactly this time, and I'll give you another," said Marjory.

It was tender-hearted Marjory who passed the fragile flower through the gate; it was consequential Marjory who bade the ragged boy come again at one particular hour; and it was forceful Marjory who went out driving the following morning and did not remember what she had promised.

And the boy? Did he forget? Why, he

I wish to write a few words of praise about Mellin's Food. I nursed my baby until he was 2 months old, and then I was compelled to put him on the bottle. had thought of but little else since daybreak, and his feet seemed to tread upon air as he made his way to Marjory's garden. But when he reached the appointed place at the appointed time, he looked in vain for the little girl with the pretty golden curls.

"I'll wait for her," he said to himself, and so he did, very patiently for awhile. "Can't be she ain't coming, can it?" he thought at last. And he pressed his face close to the gate, and strove to search her out among the trees and shrubs. He leaned rather hard, and in a moment he noticed that the great gate was yielding to his touch—it was swinging slowly open. He saw the stately, graceful flowers quite near him. Oh, how more than beautiful they were! She had said that he might have one and—

"So it's stealing you're at, is it?" said a man's voice, while a man's hand dealt the boy a stinging blow on the ear. "I've been watching you the past five minutes, sneaking and loitering about here. Now take that for your pranks," and the gardener gave the boy another smarting box and hurried him out of the gate.

Swiftly down the street the little fellow ran, nor stopped till within a dingy, dismal hallway, where he sank down into a dark corner, and wept, not because of the pain in his ears, but because of the pain in his heart.

"Oh, what did I do that for!" he sobbed. Several days went by, and the lovely chrysanthemums that the shabby stranger had dearly loved were gathered to decorate the bountiful table where Marjory sat day after day at dinner, and other chrysanthemum buds, white, yellow, and pink, had opened into flowers just as fair. The days were fast growing colder, and bare branches stretched out over the spot where Marjory had sat upon the topsy-turvy potato basket.

One morning Marjory was playing near the garden gate when she heard footsteps outside. She looked up and recognized the shabby boy.

"Boy, boy!" she called. But the boy shook his head. "Oh, boy, please come here!" she said, and at length he came.

"Don't you want some pretty chrysanthemums?" she asked.

"It's too late now!" he said in a husky voice.

"Oh, no, 'tisn't!" said Marjory.

"Yes, 'tis, too. She's dead—me mother!"

And he sank down all in a heap of grief close beside the gate, and sobbed aloud. And little Marjory slipped down, too, on the other side of the gate, as close to the bars as she could get, and she put her chubby hand through and caressed the boy's dirty cheek.

"Oh, poor, dear boy, don't cry!" she said.

And the touch of sympathy soothed him, and he told her how when first he came to the gate that his mother was very sick, and that he had begged the flower for her; how it's bright, sweet beauty had cheered her, and how he had come the next day and—and—tried to steal one, and how now there was no patient, pale-faced mother at home, and he was all alone in the world, and poor, —very poor.

Because the garden gate was so tall that Marjory could not reach the knob, she asked the sorrowful boy to wait till she called some one to open it and let him in. But he would not stay; perhaps he was afraid to meet the gardener again. But he had told Marjory where he lived, and when Marjory ran to the house she told her mother, and her mother told her father the whole story.

And what came of it? Oh, a very great deal, indeed! Marjory learned that it is not wise, that it is not truly noble and good to be boastful and consequential; that it is not safe to be forgetful, and that even a very little girl can wound a heart or heal it. And if you could look into Marjory's father's stable some morning, you would see there a happy, active, useful little lad with a clean face and a new suit of clothes, and you would hardly recognize in him the shabby stranger who, one crisp autumn morning, leaned against the tall garden gate.—Canadian Churchman.

Feast of Dolls in Tokio

THE Feast of Dolls was in full swing when we were there. Every girl in Tokio, from the tiny toddlers to the maids who think themselves women, devote a whole gala week to their dolls. The dolls are beautiful, nicely modeled, and clad often in the quaint old court dress of Japan. And yet whether the dolls or their owners—little girls, maybe, of seven, with their hair "done up" and beflowered, and walking about in long, fantastically colored kimonos, with pert airs and solemnly affected dignity—are the most entertaining, it would be hard to say. The little dolls belonging to one little girl invite the little dolls belonging to another little girl to a feast, and everything is conducted with decorum and stateliness. Then the invitation comes from the other side. And all day long the little dolls are being taken round to call on other little dolls. For full seven days this charming Feast of Dolls lasts, the most eagerly looked-forward-to festival in the Japanese calendar by the little ones of Nippon. Then the dolls are wrapped up and put away till the feast comes again next year.—Travel.

"Well, youngster, so you've come to join—eh?"

"Yes, if you please, sir," meekly responded the midshipman.

"What is it—same old yarn, sent the fool of the family to sea—eh?"

"No, sir," ingeniously replied the youngster. "Oh, no; things have altered since your time, sir."

"Go away," roared the captain, and the middy flew below as fast as his little legs could carry him.

Submarine Telegraphy

THE development of the possibilities of intercontinental intercourse, by means of the submarine telegraph, is a growth of less than fifty years. In 1850 a submarine telegraph line was laid across the English Channel and signals exchanged, but without further success, though in the following year a cable containing four copper wires insulated with gutta percha, and protected by galvanized iron wires wound spirally about it, was laid across the English Channel, and put into successful operation as a submarine telegraph line. Experiments having proved the practicability of telegraphing under the ocean, the great enterprise of a telegraph line under the Atlantic was undertaken, and the subsequent developments are described in the statement as follows:

The first attempt to lay an Atlantic cable was in 1857, the enterprise being headed by Cyrus W. Field, of New York, and Charles Bright, J. W. Brett, and others, of England. The cable was to extend from Valentia, Ireland, to Newfoundland, the length of cable necessary being estimated at 2,500 miles. The construction of this cable was similar to that across the English Channel. After 255 miles had been laid from Valentia westward, the cable broke and the work was abandoned.

In 1858 Mr. Field and his associates renewed the attempt. The United States naval vessel, "Niagara," and the British vessel "Agamemnon," carrying each one-half of the cable, proceeded to mid ocean, and after joining the ends of their respective sections, on July 29th, proceeded westward and eastward, paying out the cable and reaching their respective destinations, Newfoundland and Valentia, on the same day, August 5th, 1858, when electrical connection between the continents was at once established over 2,050 nautical miles of cable which they had thus laid. Congratulatory messages were exchanged between the President of the United States and the Queen of England, and there were public rejoicings in both countries over what was pronounced the great event of the century. After less than one month of operation, however, the cable ceased working, and it was never operated further, nor was any part of it ever recovered. During the time of its operation, 730 messages or about 10,000 words were passed over it. Its total cost was $1,256,250.

A submarine telegraphic cable to connect England with British India was laid in 1859, through the Red Sea and Arabian Sea to Kurrachee, India, having a total length of 3,043 nautical miles, but with several intermediate landings. Some portions of the line worked satisfactorily for thirty days, but few if any messages were sent over the entire length, and it soon proved a complete failure.

In 1860 elaborate study of the entire subject of submarine telegraphs and the construction of cables, was made by a committee appointed by the British Board of Trade, resulting in an expression of the belief that submarine telegraphy might, despite past failures, become successful and profitable if sufficient care were exercised in constructing, laying, and managing the cable.

A submarine telegraphic cable, which had been manufactured with great care, was laid in 1861 across the Mediterranean from Malta to Alexandria, Egypt, with intermediate landing places at Tripoli and Benghazi. The cable consisted of seven copper wires stranded together, covered with several coatings of gutta percha, alternated with other nonconducting and waterproof material, and in turn covered and protected by eighteen iron wires wound spirally about this core. This cable proved a permanent success, and went into general operation shortly after its construction. The speed of transmission, which on the Atlantic cable and shorter submarine lines had been three words per minute, was brought up to ten words per minute on each separate section, but was only three words per minute when all the sections were united and operated as a single line of 1 331 miles.

A submarine cable which had been laid across the Mediterranean Sea between France and Algeria, in 1861, proved a complete failure after a few months of experiment.

A cable line to connect India with England was undertaken by the Indian government in 1864, the line to be laid through the Arabian Sea and Persian Gulf, to connect with land lines, thence to Calais, and by the short submarine line under the British Channel, to England. The submerged line in the Arabian Sea and the Persian Gulf had a total length of 1,450 miles, but with three intermediate landing places. This line consisted of a copper core surrounded by layers of gutta percha, alternated with other non-conducting and waterproof material, being protected by an outer sheathing of twelve galvanized iron wires wound spirally about it, which in turn were protected by double wrappings of tarred hemp yarn. All of these materials and the various sections of the cable were constantly and thoroughly tested electrically and otherwise during its construction. The line when laid proved a complete success, becoming the first successful telegraphic connection between England and India.

In 1865 another attempt was made by Cyrus W. Field, of the United States, and his associates in the United States and England, to lay a submarine telegraph cable from Valentia, Ireland, to Newfoundland and the United States. The cable, for which the contract price was $3,000,000, partly in cash and partly in shares of the company, consisted of seven copper wires surrounded by numerous coatings of gutta percha, and other waterproof non-conductors. This was in turn surrounded by ten Bessemer steel wires, this being the first use of steel wires for cable protection, each wire being separately wound with pitch soaked hemp yarn, the shore ends being also further protected by thirty-six heavy iron wires wound spirally about the completed cable. The steamer "Great Eastern," then the largest steamship afloat, was specially fitted up for laying this cable. Great care was exercised in every particular, but after 1,186 miles had been laid westward from Valentia, the cable broke in water over 11,000 feet deep, and the attempts to recover it were unsuccessful.

Mr. Field and his associates renewed their efforts the next year. A new company with $3,000,000 capital was formed, with the double purpose of attempting to find the end of the cable partially laid in 1865, and complete the line, and also to lay another cable parallel with and near to it. The cable manufactured for the proposed new line was similar to that of 1865. The "Great Eastern" was remodeled to meet the requirements of the work, and left Valentia, Ireland, July 13, 1866, paying out the cable in a line about twenty-five miles north of that followed on the preceding year. She arrived safely at Newfoundland in fourteen days from the date of leaving Valentia, and electrical communication was immediately established between the United States and England, which has never since been more than temporarily interrupted. The "Great Eastern" then returned to the spot where the cable was lost in 1865, and after ten days' work succeeded in bringing the end on board from a depth of over 11,000 feet, the tests immediately made showing it to be in perfect working connection with the Valentia end. A splice was made, and the laying of the line toward Newfoundland resumed, and on September 8th, the cable was landed at that point, and the second successful line of communication between the United States and Europe thus completed, Newfoundland being already in submarine telegraphic communication with the mainland and telegraph systems of the United States. The length between Trinity Bay, Newfoundland, and Valentia, Ireland, is given by the American Cyclopaedia at 2,143 miles. The rate of speed in transmission over these cables was at the beginning eight words per minute, but increased to fifteen words per minute.

The success of the 1866 cables so completely demonstrated the practicability of submarine telegraphy, that its progress thenceforward was very rapid. A second Anglo-Mediterranean line was laid from Malta to Alexandria in 1868, proving a complete success; a cable between France and Nova Scotia was laid in 1869, and another from Suez to Bombay, India. In 1871 a cable line was laid along the eastern coast of Asia, to connect with land lines already constructed across Siberia and Russia. These land lines had been built shortly after the failure of the first Atlantic cable experiment, in the hope of connecting Europe and America by way of Siberia, Behring Straits, Alaska, British America, and the United States, but that plan becoming unnecessary after the success of the 1866 cable experiments, the land lines across Russia and Siberia were utilized to connect a cable system of the Eastern shore of Asia with the land and cable systems of Europe and America.

SODA IN HUMAN BODIES.

A Very Much Needed Worker.

Very delicate particles of soda appear in field grains such as are used by mankind.

The use made of natural soda, or Sodium Sulphate, is to oxidize the sugar in the body, thereby decomposing it and making it suitable for rebuilding the cells and preserving the bile and pancreatic juices at normal consistency.

When a person fails to use food containing this important little worker, the sugar in the body is not properly cared for, and seeks escape through the kidneys, causing Diabetes. A lack of the Sodium Sulphate is also shown by biliousness, for the bile becomes thick when its little governor is absent. Sodium Sulphate is not readily taken up by the body when given as a drug, but is quickly absorbed when furnished in Nature's way as stored in food, and in that way it is found in Grape-Nuts, the most scientifically prepared food made by man. Why? Because in Grape-Nuts the pure natural elements needed by man are preserved and presented fresh from Nature's own laboratory.

Finance and Commerce

THE item of principle interest in the business world at the moment is the financial situation in New York. Interest rates are strong and tending upward. The last bank statement is generally considered unfavorable. Deposits and loans are both sharply decreased, and in spite of this there is again a considerable loss in legal reserves. The stock market has declined some under this unfavorable influence, although, so far, nothing like panicky conditions have developed.

We have, at intervals, suggested that the drift of affairs was in this direction. Outside of Wall st. there is nothing in this tendency which at this time should cause alarm or seriously interfere with business generally. Tightness in the money market just now is not occasioned by distrust or lack of confidence anywhere. Quite the reverse is true. It is due to two causes; one temporary, the other general, and both are evidences of vigorous health in the body commercial. The temporary reason is the movement of the wheat crop. This requires actual money, or what in our financial system stands for money—currency. The West is drawing upon the East for it. In the course of another month or so this currency will begin to find its way back, through merchant and country banks, to the great financial centers again. The general reason is, the almost universal activity in business in every city and village in the land. Production and distribution are going on at a rate never before equaled. The weekly statistics of trade and transportation show this, and the general consensus of the expressions of current experience endorses it. All these increased exchanges of services and commodities, while mainly made by the creation and cancellation of credits, yet require an increased use of money or currency, and though the percentage of currency used to effect them is small, still it is an increase. Back of all this, and not quite so apparent, lies the fact that the reason production and exchanges are beyond all record, is that never before were people consuming as much as now. The personal expenses of people, particularly of the vast majority of so-called "plain people," are paid with money—currency. There needs to be more in circulation among them and is, and they carry more around in their pockets than in times when economy is more generally practised. Our monetary system almost absolutely inelastic as it is, is helpless to provide relief. The laws generally require the banks to keep funds equal to a certain percentage of deposits, and when the tendency of healthy business activity is to swell deposits through the expansion of desirable credits, the pinch comes to maintain the required reserve. So the present money stringency is due to general business activity, and ought to be productive of little harm, except possibly to the bull in stocks. In the general business situation there is no material change from last week.

Trade of the Philippines

THE trade of the Philippines in 1898 is discussed in a report of the British consul at Manila, just received by the Treasury Bureau of Statistics. He opens his report by saying: "Notwithstanding that for the moment all commercial enterprise is paralyzed, there is abundant evidence that when peace and a settled form of government are well established, the future prosperity of the Filipinos will far exceed the past. The climate of Manila, as far as I have yet experienced it, is similar to all tropical climates, and the health of Europeans depends principally upon themselves. The town of Manila, which is of great extent, has the disadvantage of being only eight or ten feet above the sea level, and as the natives have hitherto been taught to regard all sanitary projects as useless, there is heavy work in the task of draining, etc., and heavier still in persuading the Filipino that such measures are necessary."

Discussing the commerce of the Philippines, the report shows something of a falling off in the year 1898, due to the disturbed conditions, but shows the exports of sugar in 1898 to be 177,695 tons, against 202,092 in 1897, of which four fifths were from the island of Iloilo, though in 1897 only about two-thirds of the sugar exports were from Iloilo. The exportation of hemp in 1898, falls but little below that of 1897 two thirds of the amount being from the island of Iloilo, and the remainder from Cebu.

Regarding trade prospects in the Philippines, the British vice Consul at Iloilo, Mr. Fyfe, says: "The preferential tariff hitherto enjoyed by Spanish goods, and which was rapidly diverting this trade to Barcelona, being now abolished, competition from that quarter should scarcely be possible any longer. Notwithstanding the disturbed state of the country business has been well up to the average, several of the neighboring islands and provinces which have hitherto drawn their supplies from Manila having had to buy in this market during the blockade of the former port. Owing to the uncertainty of the future, fresh arrivals of goods have been on a much reduced scale, so that stocks to-day in the importer's hands are exceptionally light. The import of petroleum this year has been very small, only 30,000 cases; 74,000 cases being the import in 1897. This is accounted for by the falling off in consumption among the principal classes on account of the high price; and also on account of large stocks held over from the previous year. On account of the unsettled state of affairs in the whole group of the Philippine Islands, the sale of new milling plant has been almost nothing."

That the Philippines are likely to become of much greater value with a diversification and development of industries along the lines suggested by the requirements of the markets of the temperate zones is indicated by vice-Consul Fyfe, who says: "The final decision of the present crisis is now anxiously awaited, and time will show if these rich islands do not in the future produce many other products which have never been developed or cultivated."

AN EVIDENCE OF PROSPERITY.

It is generally conceded by economists who study the commercial situation of the country, that the great arteries of railway travel are a sure indication of its condition. A depression in commercial lines means abandoned business trips and the cancellation of pleasure travel, while a healthy condition of affairs means business trips and an increase of passengers on pleasure bent.

A good evidence that a business revival has gone broadcast over this country is the "Lake Shore Limited," the star train of the Vanderbilt system, between New York and Chicago, which is daily comfortably filled. With a view to taking the best possible care of its patrons, the New York Central has arranged to increase the equipment of this train by placing an additional standard sleeper on the trains every day. To the regular traveler the appointments and comforts of this train are well known, but if you have never made a trip on it, you owe it to yourself to see and enjoy the advance made in comfort and luxury in modern railway travel. Remember the fare is no higher on this train, except between New York and Chicago, while the accommodations and service place this particular train conspicuously at the head of the list, when compared with other lines.—Albany Journal.

The Washing of Flannels

There are two difficulties connected with the treatment of these goods which may be still further referred to—those of shrinkage and injury to the color, though each of these has been considered above in laying out the mode of operation to be pursued. All woolen goods, at least all flannels, must eventually shrink somewhat, while most colors finally lose their brilliancy. Where new flannels are to be made up, it is frequently worth while to shrink them "in the cloth," so as to avoid something of the inevitable result after the garments are made. This process of shrinking is simply a wash in clear, soft water, about the same temperature as is recommended for general washing of flannels. In this water the cloth is thoroughly wetted, run out through a wringer, shaken well, and hung up by one side to dry. When it is nearly dry it is changed and hung by the other side. The shrinkage of woolen goods is a purely mechanical process, and is neither helped nor hindered by the addition of any drug or ingredient of a chemical nature to the washing water. If we recollect that woolen cloths are pulled by being slightly wetted and pressed between rollers, we have in a nutshell the whole principle of shrinkage.

It should also be borne in mind that the finer the quality of the flannel, the greater the liability to shrink. Fine all-wool goods are the most difficult to manage; the more cotton is admixed, the more staple and durable the article.

A word in regard to the fading of colors, by way of a parting injunction. It should be said in regard to the use of ammonia in the washing water of flannels, that while its effect is very excellent upon white goods, there is a danger that it may touch some of the brighter colors and cause dullness. Where there are bright colors which would be seriously injured by fading, the following method has been tried with admirable success: Stir two tablespoonfuls of flour into one quart of cold water. Let it boil ten minutes, add warm suds, and wash the flannel in this, using the hands instead of the washboard. Rinse in three waters, all warm, and of the same temperature. Even bright, scarlet flannel will never lose its color when thus treated.—Good Housekeeping.

Notes of the World's Progress

CORNELIUS VANDERBILT whose sudden death occurred last week, left an estate matched by few, but left something greater than this, a good name. It may truly be said that of the many men of wealth, none lived a life freer from unkindly criticism or taunts of the envious, for no one could ascribe any misfortune to Mr. Vanderbilt. Of him none but kind words are spoken, from the most humble employes of corporations with which he was identified, to those who were his intimates. The death of Mr. Vanderbilt was undoubtedly due to his passion for work, which some time ago resulted in a stroke of paralysis. His absorbing devotion to duties of financial, religious, or social nature was the keynote of his character. In early manhood he received a business training fitting him for the position he was destined to occupy, and he it was who reared from its foundation the magnificent Vanderbilt fortune. Cornelius Vanderbilt shared with Miss Helen Gould the esteem of that class whose strong characteristic is antagonism to wealth. His last financial transaction was the payment of a mortgage on the home of an unfortunate friend.

FOR THE BETTER PROTECTION OF citizens of foreign nations and the prevention of such outrages as the lynching of Italians in Louisiana, two laws will be proposed at the forthcoming session of Congress. One law will propose that in the event of lynchings, Federal courts shall try the offenders; the other, that the county or State in which an outrage may occur shall pay whatever indemnity may be due foreigners for injuries. Objections are raised to each proposed piece of legislation. In the case of the former, jealousy would naturally arise should the Federal government attempt the invasion of State rights. While the second proposition will appeal strongly to the sense of justice, its successful operation is questionable. If a county or State does not protect from mob violence, it is alone responsible, not the Federal government, and should therefore pay the penalty for such lawlessness, but in the event of the State or county being unwilling to pay, how would the general government collect the tax? A forcible exercise of authority would hardly be practicable.

—X—

CUBA IS RAPIDLY BECOMING AMERICANized. Industrial life in the city of Havana is paralyzed because of labor strikes, workmen having made demands for more pay and shorter hours. No violence has been attempted, and public order has not been disturbed, but there is serious inactivity in lines of industry where, for the welfare of the public, the greatest activity should prevail. Cuban editors are now devoting columns to discussing the best form of government to be adopted. A strong feeling exists that in the event of independence being granted, the race question will be most serious of all. It is held by those best informed that white supremacy is vital, but the negroes want recognition, and will insist upon it until some practical plan of conciliation is put into effect. The latter are in the majority numerically, and fought more gallantly for independence than many of the men now in Havana who are striving for political control. Consequently the negroes justly feel they are entitled to some consideration. The Cuban army is now practically of the past. Officers and soldiers have been paid arrears in full by notes which will be paid in cash at some future date by the Cuban Republic.

—X—

THERE WAS HELD IN CHICAGO LAST week, under the auspices of the Civic Federation, a conference to discuss the question of trusts. Men of prominence from all sections of the country, leaders in politics, thought, and education, were present to give their opinions. The body was not assembled for the purpose of making recommendations, or offering resolutions, being gathered merely for an interchange of thought. The problem was thoroughly considered in all its phases, the discussions being marked by brilliant oratory. Distinctions being made between corporations and trusts, corporate rights and menace to the public through vast combinations of capital, afforded a wide scope for expressions and presentation of views which will be of value when the time for final solution arrives. The conference just closed partakes in no wise of the character of the meeting soon to be held in St. Louis, at the instance of the Governor of Texas. The latter will accept as a foregone conclusion the belief that trusts and combinations are inimical to the public good, and measures for relief will be sought.

—X—

UNION AND NON-UNION COAL MINERS in Illinois are again in collision. At Carterville, last week, six non-union negro miners were shot and a number wounded, and the situation is so strained that State troops are required to maintain order. It is difficult to locate the miners guilty of the outrage, consequently it is questionable if they are ever punished. The outbreak was caused by negroes leaving the inclosure of the mine where they were at work. Unless a settlement be effected, trouble is probable for a long time to come, and can only be prevented by military occupation.

—X—

HAVING VINDICATED THE HONOR of the army and suppressed further efforts to secure justice for Dreyfus by proposing pardon for the prisoner, France now turns attention to the trial of nearly sixty prisoners charged with conspiracy against the Republic. General Roget, M. Deroulade, and others of equal prominence, are said to be involved in a plot in which Orleanists and Bonapartists figured jointly. Proofs of the conspiracy are said to exist, and the outcome may be serious. According to information conveyed by dispatches, General Roget, with his brigade, was to have made the first move, but at the critical moment his courage failed and the result was a fiasco. Had the government been overthrown, the populace were to have been given an opportunity to pass upon the claims of the Duke of Orleans and Prince Bonapart. The former is not in good odor in European courts at present, having been politely informed in several instances that a change of residence would be desirable.

—X—

THE RETURNED EXPEDITION SENT to relieve Lieutenant Peary who is now in the frozen North, prepared to push forward next season, brings information that the explorer has already accomplished a great deal in the way of additions to the geographical knowledge of the world. Members of the relief expedition, connected with Princeton College, gathered considerable interesting scientific material. Next season, it is announced, Lieutenant Peary plans to make a quick dash for the pole, and has made preparations which, if the thing be possible, will enable him to reach his destination. The explorer has lost several toes, through freezing, but does not feel this will be much of a hindrance. So long as the North Pole exists, it is probable men will look for it, yet whatever results are accomplished, in the face of untold dangers and hardships, will be of extremely doubtful practical value. The Arctic region seems to be fit for nothing, and fills no purpose except as the jumping off place of latitude and longitude. Of what avail then to the explorer the search for the Pole, save the gathering of material for a lecture tour?

IF PRESENT PLANS ARE FULLY CARRIED out, the University of California will have the most superb home possessed by any institution of learning in the world. The institution has grown from a very humble beginning in 1853, into a university with 2,300 students enrolled in 1896. Buildings being anything but handsome specimens of architecture, and totally inadequate to their purpose, a plan has been evolved which will forever render facilities fully equal to all demands. At the instance of Mrs. Phebe Hearst, widow of the late Senator Hearst, of California, architects of the world were invited to present plans for a scholastic city that should serve for all future time. It was estimated that such competition would entail an expense of $100,000. Maps, photographs, and full descriptions of the site were distributed throughout this country and Europe, and the most distinguished architects were chosen as a jury. Of the ninety-eight contestants, the prize was awarded E. Benard, of Paris. The total cost of the buildings is estimated at $25,000,000. Not all will be erected at once, but the construction of several is already provided for.

In the Great Hall of the Church House, the Dean of St. David's will read a paper on "Church music in Wales," and the Welsh choral societies in London will sing selections.

Chicago

Wm. Edward McLaren, D.D., D.O.L., Bishop

The opening of Waterman Hall, Sycamore, yields to no preceding year in its promise of a very full session.

The members of the Clerica have resumed their monthly meetings, interrupted by the summer vacation, and were entertained, to the number of 21, by Mrs. Rushton, assisted by Miss Thompson, of St. Luke's, Evanston, on Tuesday, Sept. 12th, at 715 Reba Parkway.

The Mayor has appointed the Rev. Percival McIntire, rector of the church of the Redeemer, Chicago, a member of the committee to go to New York City on Sept. 26th, to present to Admiral George Dewey an invitation to be the guest of the city of Chicago. The invitation will be presented on the arrival of the "Olympia" in New York.

Corner-stone of St. Paul's, Kenwood, Laid

On the afternoon of the 16th Sunday after Trinity, the rector, the Rev. C. H. Bixby, laid the corner-stone of the new St. Paul's, Kenwood, in the presence of a goodly number of his parishioners. The parish house having been fully occupied for over a year, and the walls of the church being several feet above ground, it will not be long before these choice lots, 200x200 ft., at the N. E. corner of Madison ave. and 50th st., will be well filled; the plans for the rectory being already in hand.

Memorial Tablet for Rev. F. B. Dunham

On Sunday, Sept. 10th, there was unveiled, with benediction service, in the church of the Redeemer, 56th st. and Washington ave., a beautiful tablet in memory of the founder of the parish, whose work began with the erection of what is now the parish house, about ten years ago. The memorial, the work of Spaulding & Co., Chicago, is a neat example of ecclesiastical work in bronze. The style is Gothic, the size, 23½ inches by 33½, and the following is the inscription:

To the glory of God and in loving memory of the Rev. Francis B. Dunham, first rector of this parish, born Sept. 7, 1844, entered into life eternal, April 22, 1895.

The lettering and bordering represent oak leaves, with palm branches at the base, a Celtic cross in the arch, and in the four corners, the usual Christian symbols, all modeled in high relief; the whole mounted on an oak slab, 30x39, constituting in its entirety a worthy memorial of this devoted priest.

Marriage of the Rev. J. H. Dennis

At 8 A. M. of Tuesday, Aug. 15th, in the cathedral, the Rev. J. H. Dennis, recently on the staff, but now doing good work in Savanna, Ill., was married to Miss Elizabeth Jeanette Ward, the Rev. E. M. Thompson officiating.

Return of the Clergy

The Rev. Dr. Stone who has been in Europe for nearly three months, is expected to resume his duties at St. James' on Oct. 1st., sailing on his return Sept. 20th. The Sunday school was reopened at St. James', as in the city churches, last Sunday. The Rev. E. M. Stires was in the city from Delavan, and preached in Grace church Sunday morning. His assistant, the Rev. J. M. Ericsson, has returned from a fortnight's vacation in Minnesota. The Rev. A. L. Williams has returned to Christ church, Woodlawn, much benefited by his outing on Lake Superior. His locum tenens, the Rev. Leonard B. Richards, returned to Jacksonville, Ill., last week. The Rev. J. M. Chattin returned ten days ago from a three months' visit to England, and has resumed his city missionary work. The Rev. J. M. Carr, of the Holy Communion, Maywood, returned after a ten weeks' absence, at the end of last week, having visited his aged mother in his early home in Scotland. The Rev. F. D. Ward, a Western Theological graduate, who left Sycamore to take up work in Bermuda, has been visiting his friends in Chicago, prior to entering upon a curacy in St. Clement's, Philadelphia. The Rev. W. J. Hawthorne, of Wheaton, has returned from a month's vacation in New York.

Enlargement of All Saints', Ravenswood,

The Rev. C. E. Bowles will return from a three weeks' visit to Philadelphia for the reopening of his church, All Saints', Ravenswood, on Oct. 1st. Not only do the alterations provide for enlargement of the chancel, and of the nave to the extent of 100 extra seats, but give also additional room for the choir and sanctuary. The improved appearance of both exterior and interior will be noticeable.

City Mission Work

Contributors to the support of this work may be glad to know some of its details, especially in regard to penal and charitable public institutions. Most of the laity know something of the indefatigable labors of the chief missionary, the Rev. Dr. Jos. Rushton, whom the Diocesan has placed over the work. With him co-operate the Rev. J. M. Chattin, Mr. A. E. Knickerbocker, Miss Evelyn Prophet, Miss Annie Hibbert, as organist, and the Sisters of St. Mary. Regular Sunday and week day services are held, and personal visits made in the following: Home for Incurables, Home for the Friendless, the Church Home for Aged Persons, County Hospital, County Infirmary or Poor House, County Jail, and Bridewell or House of Correction; other city institutions also receive occasional attention. The staff of workers endeavor to keep track of those discharged, and so are very often called upon to give temporary relief of a pecuniary character to many of these. Dr. Rushton reports for the year a total receipt of only $488.26 for the purpose; an amount falling of course far below the total amount disbursed. Here is an abstract of the work of our lady city missionary, Miss Prophet, in a single month recently: Visited Ward 24 of County Hospital 13 times, Ward 5 nine times, Ward 7 nine times, (these wards often contain 60 or more patients); Sunday services in the same, 4; in Charity Hospital, 2; in Provident Hospital, 1; Home for Incurables, 1. Also visited for the month: The County Poor Home at Dunning, Little Sisters of the Poor, Home for Friendless, Chicago Orphan Asylum, and Sisters of Mercy; 26 letters were written for patients and others, and 48 visits paid outside of hospitals, etc.; two addresses delivered before branches of the Woman's Auxiliary, and one private Communion arranged for and attended; three half days were passed at the Church Club rooms, and $3 60 spent in car fare. Other branches of this important work exhibit a similar vigor and devotion.

New York

Henry Codman Potter, D.D., LL.D., Bishop

The archdeaconry of Westchester met at St. Paul's church, Sing Sing, Sept. 14th.

Bishop Potter who has been occupying a camp at Mohawk Island in Lake Placid, Adirondack Mountains, made an address at the re-interment of the followers of John Brown, near the grave of the latter at North Elba, N. Y.

President for St. Stephen's, Annandale

The trustees of St. Stephen's College, Annandale, have elected to the presidency of the college, in succession to the late Rev. Dr. R. B. Fairbairn, the Ven. Lawrence D. Cole, Ph. D., of Crawfordsville, diocese of Indiana, a graduate of Columbia University.

New Church School for Girls

The corporation known as the Protestant Episcopal Public School, and which has charge of Trinity School, has just established for girls a new school to be called St. Agatha's, located not far from the new buildings of the former school, near St. Agnes' chapel. Miss Emma G. Sebring, a college graduate, has been appointed principal. The opening exercises took place Sept. 11th.

St. Peter's Church, Port Chester

Plans have been prepared for a new guild hall, parish house, and rectory. The new buildings will occupy the site of the present rectory, and will be of brick and stone in the collegiate Gothic style of architecture. The guild hall will be connected with the parish house by a stairway. The rectory will extend to the front line of the church, and will connect with the latter by a cloister, which will also give access to the other buildings.

General Theological Seminary

Re-opened on Wednesday. Nearly 70 new students have applied for admission. This will, if they all come, furnish the largest number of students ever at one time in the seminary. The new buildings, Hoffman and Eigenbrodt Halls, owing to the impossibility of getting the iron for the beams and roof, are not yet finished. It is to be hoped, however, that Eigenbrodt Hall will be ready for the occupation of students in about six weeks, and that Hoffman Hall will be completed before Christmas.

Trinity Church Property Needed

The corporation of Trinity church has been apprised that application will be made to the Supreme Court, within a few days, for the appointment of Commissioners of Estimate and Assessment, relative to the city's acquiring title to land for the Riverside Drive and Pathway, from 135th st. to Boulevard Lafayette. This drive, as already laid out in intention, will cross the lower end of Trinity cemetery at 153d st. At the office of Trinity corporation it is announced that the church will not oppose the proceedings to condemn the land, except to the extent of protecting owners of lots in the cemetery.

St. Bartholomew's Oriental Mission

Has greatly increased in attendance since the recent union with it of the Armenians who formerly worshiped with the congregation at Calvary chapel, under the care of Mr. H. S. Hagopian. The latter has become assistant to the clergyman-in-charge of the Oriental mission, the Rev. Abraham Yohannan. Services and Sunday school have been kept up in the chapel of St. Bartholomew's parish house. The services are conducted in the mother tongue of the people, but in the Sunday school everything is done in English, with a view of fitting more easily for American citizenship. The school is composed of men and women as well as children, and some of the Oriental children also attend the regular English Sunday school in the parish house, and thus hasten their acquaintance with the English language. 'Quite a number can now read the English Bible without difficulty. A class of 17 candidates recently received Confirmation. Several communicants of the mission are going away every year into other parts of the country, but a correspondence is kept up with them, and they are brought as far as possible into contact with churches in their new localities. Night classes for instruction in English and other branches have been very successful. The missionaries have looked after the temporal needs of these people, and Mr. Hagopian has aided in translating for them in the hospitals, clinics, and other places where they are found in trouble, and has been instrumental in securing employment for a considerable number. Fresh air excursions have also been provided. A great majority of the people from the Far East are in such circumstances that they are obliged to live among, and work with, a class of people in this city whose influence is lowering and evil, rather than beneficial. The Oriental mission is the chief remedy to counteract this demoralizing condition of things, and is accomplishing a most practical good. A very encouraging feature is the missionary spirit that has developed—a number of young men having sought to fit themselves by study to return to Oriental lands and benefit those of their own blood. One such has lately graduated from the Episcopal Theological School at Cambridge, Mass., and goes to Persia under the auspices of the Church Missionary Society. Two are students in the General Theological Seminary; one in the medical department of Columbia University. Seven Syrians who received their education in this country are now actively engaged in teaching, preaching, and practicing medicine among Syrians, Mohammedans, Armenians, and Jews, without distinction, in the Orient. They are working hard, and yet voluntarily. Some of them keep up correspondence with this mission.

Death of Mr. Vanderbilt

Mr. Cornelius Vanderbilt died suddenly, Sept. 12th, at the age of 56. He was not only one of the wealthiest, but one of the most generous, of the prominent laymen of the Church in the United States. The amount of his wealth is estimated as high as $200,000,000, though not exactly known. The full extent of his charities is also unknown, as he was an unostentatious giver. He was accustomed to walk through various charitable institutions, and, noting a lack of something, to suggest that it be secured; and his check was always ready to pay the amount needed. His earnest convictions as a Churchman led him to regard the expenditure of his time and personal energies quite as important as that of his money, and he was seldom absent from meetings of the numerous charitable boards of which he was a member, making a rule never to accept membership in a board which he could not attend thus regularly. He was a vestryman of St. Bartholomew's church, and he and his mother were the builders and the endowers of the magnificent St. Bartholomew's parish house, one of the most vigorous centres of Church work in the Anglican Communion. He backed all the various energies of the parish. He was also an active member of the Board of Missions of the American Church, and not only gave liberally, but frequently aided the board by temporary loans when funds ran short. He was one of the trustees of the cathedral of St. John the Divine, and gave $100,000 to its building fund. He was a trustee of the General Theological Seminary, and was especially active as a trustee of St. Luke's Hospital and Columbia University, having been concerned in selecting the new sites of these institutions. He built and gave to his railroad employees a religious club house in New York, and most of his public addresses were delivered in that place. He was one of the managers of the Metropolitan Museum of Art, being chairman of the executive committee. He presented to the art gallery Rosa Bonheur's great picture of "The Horse Fair." He was also president of the association in charge of the New York Botanical Garden. In 1886, in union with his brothers, he gave $250,000 for the erection of the Vanderbilt Clinic of the medical department of Columbia University, as a memorial of his father, who himself had given to the same faculty half a million. In 1899 he united with his brothers and his sister, Mrs. Sloane, in another gift of $350,000, to build and equip a large addition to the Vanderbilt Clinic; Mrs. Sloane giving $650,000 for the Sloane Maternity Hospital associated with the clinic. Mr. Vanderbilt was chairman of the executive committee of St. Luke's Hospital, and a trustee of the Home for Incurables, the Hospital for the Relief of the Ruptured and Crippled, and the Maternity Hospital. The burial service was held Sept. 15th, in St. Bartholomew's church, and was conducted by Bishop Potter and the rector, the Rev. David H. Greer, D.D. The service was simple, and the greater portion of the church was thrown open to the public without restriction. The music was in charge of Mr. Richard Henry Warren, organist, and was conducted by a choir of 60 voices. The interment was in the family mausoleum at New Dorp, Staten Island.

Pennsylvania

Ozi William Whitaker, D.D., LL.D., Bishop

Bishop Whitaker sailed for home from Liverpool on the 16th inst.

Quite a number of city rectors have returned from their summer vacation, and have resumed charge of their respective parishes. Among these may be named: The Rev. Dr. Wm. Bayard Hale, of St. Mary's, Ardmore; the Rev. W. W. Steele, of St. Mary's, and the Rev. C. M. Armstrong, of St. Andrew's, West Philadelphia.

Marriage of the Rev. Samuel Ward

There was a quiet wedding at St. Stephen's church, Philadelphia, on Thursday noon, 14th inst., when the Rev. Samuel Ward, of Holy Trinity, Lansdale, Pa., was united in holy matrimony to Miss Kate Tilge, of Germantown. The office was solemnized by the Rev. J. L. Miller, curate, assisted by the Rev. Cresson McHenry.

Massachusetts

William Lawrence, D. D., Bishop

The Rev. Charles W. Duane, rector of Christ church, Boston, is chairman of the committee of the Franklin fund. This is an important fund to the city of Boston, and now amounts to $370,000.

St. Anne's, Dorchester, has been undergoing repairs during the summer. A new heating apparatus has been put in place, and the interior of the church greatly improved. Christ church, Cambridge, has also had repairs made upon the exterior.

The Rev. A. E. George held religious services during August on the old hunting grounds of the Nanset Indians, North Eastham, Mass. The place is now marked by three large lighthouses and this is the first time that a Church service was ever held in this locality.

A large memorial window will soon be placed in the church of the Messiah, Boston. The chancel in this church is a memorial of the Beebe family, and this addition is the completion of the work. The window cost over $3,000.

Funeral of Mr. Edward N. Perkins

The funeral of Edward N. Perkins, a well-known Churchman, was held on Sept. 15, at the chapel of Forest Hills cemetery. Bishop Hall, of Vermont, officiated, assisted by the Rev. H. M. Torbert, of St. Stephen's church. Among those present were the Rev. Dr. Coit, of Concord, N. H., Bishop Doane, Monseigneur Doane, Prof. Charles Elliot Norton, and others.

The Episcopal City Mission

Has received $10,000 as a memorial fund in the name of the late Mrs. Elizabeth Carlile Choate. The income of this will be used for summer work, and for the mission to seamen. From June 1st to Aug. 1st, $4,556 have been given to the City Mission. Its playrooms have been full this season, and a larger number of teachers have been employed.

A Parish House for Cohasset

The Church people of Cohasset have now purchased the old Central school building, which they have heretofore leased from the town. The price paid is $2,000. The old building will be removed to the rear of the lot and repaired. It will make a good parish house. The stone church will soon be finished, and will be a great addition to the town, which is one of the most popular summer resorts near Boston.

The New St. Andrew's, Edgartown

Thursday, the 7th inst., the corner-stone of the new church was laid by Bishop Talbot, of Central Pennsylvania. The weather was ideal. A platform had been erected and covered with carpet. On this was a cabinet organ with a choir in front, and a large and interested congregation. The Bishop and a goodly number of the clergy marched in procession to the church lot at 2:30 P. M., and ascended the platform. The Rev. Andrew Gray, D.D., who has been in charge of St. Andrew's for some months, acted as master of ceremonies. The service opened with a hymn, followed by the usual office for the laying of a corner-stone, in which the Bishop led. Before the laying of the stone the Rev. Dr. Gray read a list of articles placed in the copper box beneath, which included a copy of THE LIVING CHURCH and a history of the parish. The work begun some two or three years ago, by the Rev. William C. Hicks, but allowed for sometime to stand still, has thus been revived, and is now taking shape. The church is to be of brick, with open timber roof. It will consist of porch, nave, chancel, baptistry, and vestry. There will be a neat turret or bell tower, surmounted by a spire. The design is very neat, and the building can easily be enlarged should future needs require.

Nebraska

George Worthington, S.T.D., LL.D., Bishop

The work at Creighton, under the faithful care of the missionary, the Rev. J. C. Ingersoll, has made steady and certain advances during the last three years. Baptisms and Confirmations have been larger than ever before, and it is with a feeling of great regret that the people regard the removal of their missionary to another field of labor.

The work of Trinity mission, Norfolk, has gone on quietly during the summer; the congregations have been somewhat larger than usual; there have been a number of Baptisms. Last month the boy choir passed a very enjoyable week in camp on the banks of the Elkhorn river. In the first part of the summer, a payment of $100 was made on the rectory, leaving a balance of $800.

St. Peter's, Neligh

In this mission station we have a small band of the faithful, a neat church, and a comfortable rectory. Somewhat over a year ago there was a bank failure which sorely afflicted the people, several losing their all. There was a debt of nearly $1,000 and no priest in charge to care for the flock. The mortgage was due, and foreclosure seemed certain. Providentially the Bishop secured the services of Mr. R. Alan Russell, now deacon. Despite many discouragements, this faithful worker worked in season and out of season, with the result that the entire indebtedness has been raised, and soon the church will be consecrated. The interior of the church has been made beautiful. Altar linen has been received, a complete set of altar frontals, lecturn-falls, and desk-falls has been presented to the church. The chancel has been rendered Churchly. The rectory has been repapered throughout and repainted within.

Connecticut

Chauncey B. Brewster, D.D., Bishop

New Hall for Trinity College

Ground was broken Sept. 4th for the new $50,000 Hall of Natural History at Trinity College. The building will be erected from plans by Wm. C. Brocklesby, architect, and will occupy a site on the southern portion of the campus in line with the Hall of Science. It will have a frontage to the north of 122 ft., and width of 72 ft., and will be three stories high above an ample basement. The materials used in construction will be common brick, molded brick, and sandstone for finish.

Delaware

Leighton Coleman, D.D., LL.D., Bishop

Immanuel Church, Wilmington,

Has been enlarged, and will be reopened shortly. The nave and chancel are each double their former size. Room was found by extending the building on the rear of the rectory grounds. The interior is finished in natural wood, new windows of cathedral glass and handsome pattern have replaced the old, and the walls are tinted and frescoed to harmonize with the other work. Plans and specifications, together with most careful supervision, were generously donated by the architect, Mr. W. D. Brinckle, son of the senior warden of the parish. The congregation has needed more room for some time, and this will prove a stepping-stone to a building in the future, meeting the wants of a growing community.

Minnesota

Henry B. Whipple, D.D., LL.D., Bishop
W. N. Gilbert, D.D., LL.D., Bishop-coadjutor

The opening services of the Seabury Divinity School will be held in the oratory on the festival of St. Michael and All Angels. The entering class promises to be an excellent one, all its members but one being college men.

Tennessee

Thomas Frank Gailor, D.D., Bishop

On Aug 6th, Feast of Transfiguration, Bishop Gailor ordained to the priesthood, Mr. Allison Granville, at Pulaski, Tenn. Presenter, the Rev. T. F. Martin, dean of the convocation. This was Bishop Gailor's first parish, and the house was packed. The Bishop preached the sermon, taking for his subject, "The Christian ministry." At night he confirmed 13 candidates. This increases the membership from 45 to 58. The Rev. Allison Granville is now the rector of the church at Pulaski. The Rev. Alexander Patterson, missionary for this portion of the diocese, assisted in the service. From Aug. 20th-27th inclusive, he held a Mission at Cumberland Furnace, preaching to crowded congregations.

Milwaukee

Isaac Lea Nicholson, D.O., Bishop

Opening of Christ Church, La Crosse

Sunday, Sept. 10th, the services began at 7:30 A. M., with the celebration of Holy Communion. At 10:30 o'clock, the procession, composed of the choristers, wardens, vestrymen, architect, building committee, rector of the parish, and Bishops Nicholson and Gilbert, moved to the chancel, singing the processional hymn, "Rejoice." Mr. Mills Tourtelotte, acting for the building committee, made formal transfer of the church building to the rector, wardens, and vestrymen. This was received by the senior warden, Judge B. F. Bryant, on behalf of the parish. Then followed Morning Prayer, in its shortened form, by the Rev. Dr. Fayette Durlin who was rector of this parish 35 years ago, and the Rev. William P. Ten Broeck who was also rector of this parish for over 20 years. The rector, the Rev. Dr. Wilkins, made an address thanking the building committee and others connected with the erection of the building. The benediction of the altar, organ, chancel furniture, and windows to the memory of the late Mr. A. A. Stevens and Mrs. Cynthia Stevens, Mr. Thomas D. Servis, and the Hon. Angus Cameron, was followed by the celebration of the Eucharist by the two Bishops. Bishop Nicholson preached the sermon. The Rev. Fayette Durlin was the first speaker in the afternoon, and was followed by the Rev. W. P. Ten Broeck. Both spoke of the history of the parish. Bishop Gilbert, of Minnesota, spoke of the relations between La Crosse and Minnesota. The interests, he said, are reciprocal. Mayor Anderson followed with a few well-chosen words, in which he praised the efforts of the parish in building such a beautiful house of worship. Judge Bryant, for the vestry and congregation, thanked those who were instrumental in successfully undertaking the great task. He spoke of Dr. Wilkins' work in this connection, and paid a high tribute to his leadership. "Were it not for him, we would not have had any church." In the evening, the rite of Confirmation was administered to a large class by Bishop Nicholson, and an excellent address was made by the Rt. Rev. M. N. Gilbert. The chorus rendered, among other selections, Haydn's "The heaven's are telling," with fine effect. The La Crosse convocation held a meeting the next morning, and discussed the work under their care.

Situated in one of the most conspicuous and commanding locations in the city, the new church faces east and south. It is 149 ft. in length, 107 ft. in extreme width, and the tower rises 120 ft. above the foundations. The material is native limestone, with trimmings of red sandstone. The roof is slate, and tiles are used to complete the tower. There is a low battlemented tower at the rear, somewhat novel and striking in effect. The design was by Mr. M. S. Detweiler, a local architect. The building costs, as it stands to-day, approximately $50,000. The terrace wall is of red sandstone, and about the church is a luxuriant lawn. The roof rises to a height of 70 ft. at the crossing of the transept, where there is a sunburst in colored glass, which will be the principal source of light, although there are numerous other ceiling and side lights, gas, and electricity. The principal window is on the south side, and was erected in memory of the late United States Senator Angus Cameron, by Mrs. Cameron. It was done by Tiffany, at a cost of $2,500. The chancel is paneled with Scagliola. A three-manual Moller organ occupies the north-west corner at the left of the chancel. In the building are vestry rooms, choir rooms, guild room, and all accessories.

Maine

Henry Adams Neely, D.D., Bishop

MacMahan Island

A choice lot has been generously given by the Sheepscot Land Company for a chapel at this romantic summer retreat on the coast of Maine. Funds are being raised and plans made for a tasteful Gothic structure, which, it is hoped, will be ready for use early next summer. The colony is largely made up of Church people, and several of the clergy already have cottages there. The chapel will be a benefit, also, to Church people visiting some of the neighboring islands who this year have come in boats to the services held at one of the cottages.

Western New York

Wm. D. Walker, D.D., LL.D., Bishop

The Rev. A. Sidney Dealey, rector of St. Luke's, Jamestown, has been requested to withdraw his resignation recently handed to the vestry. At a special meeting, at which every member of the vestry but one was present, a letter was read from Bishop Walker, urging that Mr. Dealey be retained, and speaking eulogistically of him as a man, and of his work as a rector. The ladies of the parish had circulated a petition, which was numerously signed, asking the vestry to induce Mr. Dealey to remain as rector of the parish. By unanimous vote of those at the meeting, request was made to that effect. Mr. Dealey has decided to comply, and he will remain in the charge which he has so faithfully and zealously filled.

Kansas

Frank Rosebrook Millsbaugh, D.D., Bishop

New Church at Eureka

The corner-stone of the new church was laid by Bishop Millsbaugh, on the 15th Sunday after Trinity. Mr. G. W. Davidson, candidate for Holy Orders, had been working during two vacations, and secured sufficient subscriptions to complete the church. There are 25 communicants in this mission, and the people have set to work in earnest. The church is to be completed in two months.

Progress at Yates Centre

Archdeacon Crawford visited Calvary church last week and baptized 11. The Bishop soon followed him, confirming them, and baptizing two others. Two years ago we had nothing here; now there is a church costing $1,500, out of debt, and 40 communicants who have a mind to work.

New Jersey

John Scarborough, D.D., Bishop

The Associate Mission in Trenton

The laying of the corner-stone of the Associate Mission building, on Hamilton ave., was the occasion of much rejoicing on the part of those interested in the mission work of this diocese. Bishop Scarborough officiated, assisted by the clergy of the mission and visiting clergy. The Rev. F. A. Conover read the list of articles put in the stone, and made an address on the history of the Associate Mission, from the beginning to the laying of the corner-stone of the mission house in Trenton, Aug. 30, 1899. At a meeting of the convocation of New Brunswick, held in Red Bank, Sept. 12, 1898, an essay was read by the Rev. Edward J. Knight, advocating the plan of an Associate Mission for carrying on the missionary work of the convocation. The plan was adopted at a subsequent meeting of convocation, a house was rented at 266 Hamilton ave., and the Rev. Edward J. Knight was appointed as head of the work. On St. Michael and All Angels' Day, 1894, he was joined by the Rev. Thomas. J. Conover, and the work then fairly began. Small parishes and missions have from that day to this been seeking the care of the Associate Mission, until now it has under its charge three parishes, 15 organized missions and Sunday schools, and some 20 other mission stations. It holds services in churches, halls, schoolhouses, and private houses. It has built churches at Cadwalader Place, Wilbur, and Carteret. It has rebuilt a church on the outskirts of Rahway. It has built several parish buildings, and has brought to the diocese property worth $15,000, besides that of the mission house, which, when completed, will, with the lot, be valued at $10,000 or $12,000. The services held have been about 6,000. The number of communicants under its charge is about 500 or 600. It had nearly 600 Baptisms and 120 Confirmations. And this work has been done at the rate of $3,000 or $4,000 a year, of which $1,200 or $1,500 was given by the diocese. About three-quarters of the support has come from the churches served. The speaker said that the history must not be closed without an affectionate reference to the Rev. Dr. Bishop, of the diocese of Newark, who, by a bequest of $3,000, made the house to be built a possibility. Bishop Scarborough made an address, in which he stated that the occasion was of more intense interest to him than any one else. He had always, since he had been bishop, hoped for some such outcome of mission work, but never dreamed it would be so prosperous. He gave high praise to the Rev. Messrs. Knight and Conover as the two men who had made the work successful, the Rev. Mr. Conover having refused tempting offers at much increased salary to leave, and the Rev. Mr. Knight doing his part of the work in addition to his many duties as rector of a large and growing parish. The building was to be a home for the young men of the mission. Each was to have a room for study and sleeping. There was to be a prayer room, library, drawing room, room for committees and the Bishop, and rooms for the matron. It would be very useful as a headquarters for diocesan work. The Rev. E. J. Knight was called upon by the Bishop. He said that the inspiration of the movement came from the Bishop who had at all times been a willing and able adviser in it, and a financial contributor to its success as well. About half the cost of the building has been provided for. At the close of the services, tea was served by the ladies of the parish in the guild house of Christ church.

The Bishop's Visit to Wilkesburg

On the evening of the 15th Sunday after Trinity, the Bishop made his first official visitation at the lately organized mission in Wilkesburg, known by the name of the church of the Advent, the Rev. A. Alexander, rector. There was a very large attendance, a hearty service, and good music. The Bishop preached and confirmed a class of 16 candidates. The work seems to be making progress in many ways. The services are now held in a third-story hall, but plans are on foot to secure a lot and erect a church as soon as possible.

New Church Building at Oakland

On Monday afternoon, Sept. 11th, the corner-stone of the St. Mary memorial was laid by Bishop Whitehead. This building will be erected on McKee Place, Oakland, and is the outcome of a small mission organized by the Bishop in August, 1894. Services were first held in a hall on Fifth ave., and later, a small building was secured on Atwood st., where the mission was known by the name of St. Matthew's chapel. The new structure is to be a memorial of two Christian women by the name of Mary, hence the change of name. The greater part of the money required for the main building is furnished by one of them, and the chancel and choir are being given by a relative in memory of the other. The plans contemplate a building about 86 by 48. In the basement there will be a reading room for men, and a large room for the Boys' Brigade, or for parish feasts, with kitchen and pantry attached. On the main floor, on either side of the entrance hall, will be a women's room and a children's room, opening by large sliding doors into the main audience room. Opening out of this by an openwork screen, will be the chancel, completely finished. On one side of this will be the organ and baptistry, and on the other the robing room or sacristy. On the second floor in the front part of the building, will be two rooms for the use of the chaplain, and a gallery. The ceremony at the laying of the corner-stone was a very simple one, the Bishop being assisted by the Rev. Mr. Heffern, who before the inception of the mission had a Sunday school and occasional services in the vicinity; the Rev. W. B. Beach, a former curate, and the Rev. Messrs. W. L. H. Benton and W. J. White. The building is to be finished in December, and it is expected that it will be opened with a service of benediction on Saturday evening, Dec. 23d. The Rev. John Warnock has been appointed the Bishop's chaplain in charge of the work, and will enter upon his duties on Sunday, Sept. 24th.

Washington

Henry Yates Satterlee, D.D., LL.D., Bishop

During the month of August a convenient arrangement was made by the two principal parishes of Georgetown, St. John's and Christ church, enabling the rectors, neither of whom has an assistant, to enjoy a vacation. The churches are not very distant from each other, and the Sunday services were held at each alternately, by the Rev. Dr. Frank M. Gibson, both congregations attending.

The Cathedral Foundation

Very satisfactory progress has been made during the summer in the construction of the Hearst School, the first building begun on the cathedral foundation. The first-story floor has been completed, and the greater part of the exterior and interior walls of the main story erected and ready for the iron roof, which is being manufactured in Chicago. This portion of the building will contain all the school rooms, reception rooms, and the assembly hall.

Marquette

Gershom Mott Williams, D.D., Bishop

The rector of the church of the Transfiguration, Ironwood, the Rev. J. P. de B. Kaye, was married Sept. 6th to Miss Francis C. Nelson, the Bishop officiating.

Maryland

William Paret, D.D., LL.D., Bishop

The congregation of Emmanuel church, Cumberland, has given the contract for a new organ to the Odell Company, of New York, and it is expected it will be completed by Dec. 20th. The organ is to cost $3,150, exclusive of a new organ chamber, which is to be built of stone, in harmony with the rest of the church.

Removal of St. Andrew's, Baltimore

The vestry, with the consent of Bishop Paret, has placed the church property on South High st. in the hands of Mr. J. B. Chastain for sale. The church committee and vestry have under consideration several sites for a new church but as yet none have been definitely decided upon. The congregation of St. Andrew's was established in 1837, by the Rev. John Johns who was then rector of old Christ church, and later, Bishop of Virginia. The first rector of the church was the Rev. H. V. D. Johns, a brother of Dr. Johns.

Editorials and Contributions

WE printed recently an appeal for poor Puerto Rico, issued by the Bishop who is in charge of the interests of this Church in that island. The appeal should be emphasized until a wide response enables our representatives at Ponce, San Juan, and elsewhere, to extend intelligent aid in the name of Christ and the Church, to the poor people who have been so terribly smitten. It is hoped that our clergy and laity will see the need of turning their donations in this particular direction, rather than in others where the Church will not have the credit, nor her faithful agents on the island the disbursing. And there should be no delay. In some of our dioceses the bishops have authorized a general collection in all the churches.

The Requirements for Admission to Holy Orders

IN our issue of August 19th, Bishop Potter proposed a plan for improving the quality of candidates for Holy Orders, which, coming from such a source, is worthy of respectful attention. He thinks, in the first place, that a large part of the present evil of admitting men to Holy Orders who are unqualified in point of learning, or character, "resides in the present condition of the canons, which practically provide between seventy and eighty different standards for admission to the ministry." The power vested in the bishop (usually, it is to be remembered, with the consent of the Standing Committee) is so large "as to make it extremely easy to open the gates to a large influx of uneducated men." We agree with the Bishop in thinking that the canons of ordination need a thorough overhauling. They lack simplicity. The rules laid down are sometimes trivial, sometimes complicated. They sometimes admit of more than one interpretation. On the whole, they attempt too much. There is in them an exemplification of the American reliance upon a mechanical system of checks and balances. It is assumed that the more numerous the persons or bodies of persons from whom certificates must be obtained, the more security there is for the Church as against unworthy or unprepared candidates. Doubtless this would be the case if each signer of such certificates could vouch for the truth of the statements contained in it, from his own direct personal knowledge. But this is rarely the case; and it is, in fact, in many cases impossible.

AMONG the papers which must be submitted to the Standing Committee by a postulant desiring to become a candidate, is a certificate that "A. B. is pious, sober, and honest; that he is attached to the doctrine, discipline, and worship of the Protestant Episcopal Church," is a communicant, and that in the opinion of the signers "he possesses such qualifications as fit him for entrance on a course of preparation for the holy ministry." How many vestries of large parishes are in a position to testify to these points, of their own knowledge? That A.B.'s name is on the roll of communicants is often the only thing which they can assert with confidence. Their opinion of his qualifications may be absolutely worthless. Later on, when the candidate desires ordination, the vestry is again called upon to certify to his character and orthodoxy for the space of three years last past. Here again, it is as likely as not, that nothing is known of the young man by a single member of the vestry except from hearsay, and yet this may be neither his fault nor theirs. A case in point may be cited which is not by any means unique. A young man left home for college, and during the next seven years of college and seminary life he rarely returned to his native city even in vacation. It happened that he did not attend service in his parish church more than a dozen times in all that period. His family became broken up and scattered. The result was that he was unknown by face or name to a single member of the vestry at the end of that time. His only personal relation to the parish was through the rector, with whom he maintained a correspondence. Yet his testimonials were signed without question. No doubt the vestry was entirely justified in signing them. But who would say that such a testimonial was of the slightest value in protecting the Church against an unfit man? The vestry in this, and numberless other cases, merely register and indorse the recommendation of the rector. His opinion, in fact, determines the whole action, and with him, it would seem, ought to rest the entire responsibility.

IN this, and many similar instances, it must strike an unprejudiced mind, having regard to the realities of things and no great attachment to forms for form's sake, that the persons who have the best means of forming a judgment in the matter do not appear at all. If a young man has spent four years at a college, it would be quite feasible to demand that he produce evidence of his standing, both intellectual and moral, before he is admitted as a candidate. If he has spent a period of time at a Church seminary, the head, and other officers, ought to have the very best means of judging of his character, his intellectual qualifications, and the reality of his vocation for the sacred ministry. But the canons seem to display a certain distrust of seminaries. They are hardly allowed to appear in any official way. Again, the report of the ecclesiastical examiners, one of the most important means of ascertaining the intellectual qualifications of the candidate, is not among the papers which must be submitted to the Standing Committee. The examining chaplains are responsible solely to the bishop. Their office is simply to supply him with certain material to aid him in forming his judgment. He is not in any way bound, so far as the canons are concerned, to abide by their conclusions, but may, if he pleases, ignore them entirely, and form his decision on the strength of the examination which he personally conducts in the presence of any two presbyters he may select. Yet, curiously enough, in spite of the fact that their report has no such place in the scheme of things as that which is held by the other certificates or testimonials, the examining chaplains alone are required to express in set terms a sense of their "responsibility for the evil which might come upon the Church through the admission of men insufficiently prepared," etc., although canonically they have nothing to do with such admission!

IF all the persons who are called upon to sign the various testimonials, acted under this "sense of responsibility," and if it were even possible, as usually it is not, for them to have personal knowledge of the facts to which they testify, doubtless our system would be effective enough. But it is a matter of experience that the result of requiring several persons or bodies to testify in a certain gradation to the same points, is not to provide additional security, but to divide responsibility, until it may come to be little felt by any of those concerned. Each one passes it on to the next, or justifies his signature by reference to those who have signed before him. And as we have seen, it is often impossible that he should do otherwise. The phraseology commonly employed requires only "evidence satisfactory to us," or the evidence of "certificates laid before us." In short, a careful examination of the whole process makes it clear that there are ordinarily only two persons who have the real responsibility; namely, the rector, or "spiritual pastor," and the bishop. It is upon the judgment of these that the decision rests. The entire series of papers is little more than repeated expressions of confidence in that judgment.

WE agree with the Bishop of New York also in believing that it is a serious matter that the canons should allow so much discretion as practically to provide "between seventy and eighty standards for admission to the ministry." There is no doubt that the standard ought to be nearly uniform, both as regards time and scholastic requirements. One direction especially in which we think the canons need sharp retrenchment, is in the requirements laid upon ministers of other denominations seeking the priesthood. The latitude now allowed is full of danger to the life and teaching of the Church, as the bishop himself shows: "The vagrant minister, or he of unsavory record or doubtful soundness in the faith, is tempted by such a condition of things to turn from other Communions to the Church, as a short cut to the honors and emoluments of a calling for which, it may be, he is doubly disqualified." Almost every canonical amendment relating to this subject for years past has been in a wrong direction, and it is undeniable that much evil fruit has been the result. To be able to point to a long and increasing list of ministers who have sought Holy Orders is a poor compensation for the evil wrought by men who have had no proper training for the priesthood, and no affection for the old paths of the Church. It is true that very eminent men have come to us in times past, and men who, embracing with heart and soul the principles of the Church, have been of signal value to the cause of Christ in their day and generation. But these are men who would have acquiesced in any tests of time and preparation which might be deemed necessary. Nowadays, under our lax provisions, we see men coming in who do not contemplate the idea of submission to the Church, but rather that the Church shall submit to them. They come as self constituted prophets to institute a reformation on principles learned in another atmosphere.

BISHOP POTTER has one panacea for the abuses connected with Holy Orders. It is, he says, the only remedy, and is a very radical one. It is that the General Convention shall elect a board of examiners, and that all candidates be obliged to pass the examinations of this single central board, "whose rejection shall be final." This would have the effect of setting up one uniform standard. Every man would thus have to win his way by sheer merit, and the Bishop evidently believes that such a board could be relied upon to act "without fear, favor, or affection." While we are open to conviction, we must confess that, with our present lights, we cannot regard this proposal with much hopefulness. It has the one merit of making the intellectual standard uniform. Beyond this, the objections seem very serious. We shall not now pause to enlarge upon the dangers of centralization. But the Bishop has spoken of "moral" as well as "intellectual" qualifications, and many will consider "spiritual" qualifications as more important still. In our own experience, the greatest danger to the Church is not in the influx of uneducated men, but of unspiritual men—men who possess no real "vocation" for the sacred ministry. The instances are not few of men sufficiently educated and abundantly able to pass any examination which may be required of them, who are still destitute of the qualifications which the priesthood pre-eminently demands. They are not on fire with the love of souls, and there is nothing which constrains them to cry, "Woe is me if I preach not the Gospel." Others are so destitute of that capacity of sympathy and adaptation which goes to make up what is sometimes called "sanctified common-sense," that it is simply impossible for them to cope successfully with the problems of parish work. No board of examiners, central or local, can determine the status of the candidate in these respects. In these points, the most important of all, there is no way of removing the responsibility from the shoulders of the immediate spiritual superiors of the young man who seeks Holy Orders.

SO far as we feel prepared to suggest remedies, they are of an old-fashioned kind. We should like to see the canons simplified. We see no reason, for instance, why the bishop should be instructed how to proceed in accepting a postulant. Such of the present testimonials as may be seen to constitute no real safeguard, might be dispensed with as tending to obscure the sense of responsibility. Dispensations from the required subjects of study might well be cancelled, except, perhaps, in the case of Hebrew. It is doubtful whether the limit of time ought ever to be reduced, except in the case of a deacon appointed to the independent charge of a parish—a state of things, by the way, which the ordinal does not contemplate. To pass over other points, the canons relating to the admission of ministers from other bodies ought to be made more stringent, and safeguards provided against the idea of a "short cut" to the priesthood. Finally, we would have the responsibility everywhere and always made to rest upon those to whom it really belongs, the bishops and pastors of the Church, who have a duty in the matter which cannot be evaded, and whose opportunities for acquiring an accurate knowledge of the fitness of candidates are such as no others possess. Human judgment, at the best, may err; mistakes are inevitable, but it is better that they should lie at the door of those to whom the decision really belongs, than that the responsibility should be so artificially distributed that it becomes difficult to trace it to its true source. Add to all this, that we would by no means see the power of the bishop limited in the matter of the rejection of a candidate. No power on earth should force him to lay hands in ordination upon one whom, even at the eleventh hour, he has been led to regard as unworthy or unfit.

The Faith Unto Salvation

RECENT discussions on the subject of what is required to be believed, or the faith necessary to salvation, betray much shallowness in the conception of vital matters. Very dangerous positions are confidently put forth by those whose appreciation of the principles at stake is seriously at fault. There is a prevalent assumption that any one is capable of grappling with theological subjects, with or without preliminary training. When it is said that the Apostles' Creed contains everything necessary to salvation, it was never meant that this statement applies to that Creed as every perverse mind may choose to interpret it. Nor is it meant that it is sufficient to accept the statements of the Creed as "facts," while deliberately rejecting all interpretation as mere speculation. The statements of the Creed have value because the facts there enunciated have a meaning. In reality, this is admitted even by those who are most insistent in making a distinction between facts and doctrines. The Creed may be taken in a Unitarian, a Nestorian, or an Eutychian sense. But according to the mind of the Church to which we belong, to hold it knowingly in such a sense is not to profess the faith necessary to salvation. The Prayer Book with its catechism, its articles of religion, and the teaching of its offices, furnishes the authorized interpretation of the Creed. Those, therefore, who claim to hold the Apostles' Creed, while they deliberately reject the teachings of the Prayer Book, are not justified in asserting that they hold all to which they were pledged in Baptism. They do not accept "all the Articles of the Christian faith as contained in the Apostles' Creed" unless they accept them in the sense in which the Church holds them. In other words, they do not, according to the mind of the Church, accept the faith necessary to salvation.

IT is to be observed that we have been speaking of those who "deliberately" take up the position described. It is quite otherwise with those who, through ignorance or misapprehension, attach a wrong interpretation to the Creed in some of its enunciations. There are many such who have no intention of contradicting or opposing the teaching of Church or Prayer Book. The simple statements of the Creed are the starting points, the first elements of divine knowledge. The most devout and loyal soul, in the endeavor to gather out of them the profound underlying significance, is liable to mistake, even while there is no conscious departure from the truth as the Church has received it. We have here something akin to the mistaken conceptions which children form of the meaning of facts for the first time presented to their minds—conceptions which are dispelled or modified by the processes of education. It is here that the distinction has been made between "material" or unintentional heresy and "formal" or deliberate heresy. The former is not blameable, for there is in it no intentional departure from the ancient Faith. The latter is nothing less than open rebellion. Whether it be the case of the priest or of the layman, we are bound to go on "from faith to faith," and constantly to increase unto "the perfect knowledge" of God.

The Rights of Animals

FROM A SERMON PREACHED IN SHREWSBURY SCHOOL CHAPEL BY THE REV. PREBENDARY MOSS

"Thou shalt not muzzle the ox when he treadeth out the corn."—Deut. xxv: 4.

THIS is something more than a moral precept; it breathes the spirit of chivalry. It reads like the product of a far later age than that in which it was framed. For, that animals have rights, is a modern idea—an idea which even in our own day is recognized only partially and imperfectly. The words read as though the lawgiver's conscience were illuminated by a sudden flash of insight. "It is fair that even the poor laboring ox should partake of the food which he is preparing for the use of man; let him receive as well as give." St. Paul quotes the words of the text twice, in the first Epistle to the Corinthians and in the first Epistle to St. Timothy; and in both passages draws from it the inference that Christ's ministers have a just claim on the laity for support.

"Thou shalt not muzzle the ox when he treadeth out the corn." The Jew was to be grateful and generous to the animal that helped him, not to treat it in a grudging and churlish spirit. As we read, it is impossible to help wondering which object was more prominent in the lawgiver's mind, the good of the ox, or the refinement and elevation of its master's character.

Surely, few things are more mysterious than the purpose and destination of the animal life which abounds around us. In its higher forms its framework is curiously like that of human beings; its sensations are similar to our own; it is capable of pleasure and pain. There are animals which appear to share some even of our moral qualities—fidelity, dutifulness, sensitiveness to praise and blame, reverence, affection. The affection of dogs for their masters sometimes outlasts human friendships. Some of you will remember the scene in the "Odyssey," where Argus, the dog of Ulysses, recognizes, in spite of his disguise, the master whom he has not seen for close upon twenty years, and then dies instantaneously, as though in an ecstasy of joy. Very likely this touching picture is drawn from life. * * * It is said that when Italians of the lower classes are remonstrated with about their cruelty to animals, the reply is almost invariable: "Oh! an animal has not a soul." As though that fact, if it is a fact, excluded the brute creation at once from the range of man's sympathy and God's pity. What a different spirit is displayed in our Lord's words: "Are not two sparrows sold for a farthing? and not one of them shall fall on the ground without your Father."

Let us grant, for the sake of argument, that an animal's life ends with its death. Does not the very shortness of its existence strengthen its claim to be treated reasonably and kindly? Men are the earthly providence of any animals which they have attached to themselves. We exact from these animals such service as they can give, and, so far, we are within our right. Is it only quixotic, or is it not rather the natural impulse of a generous mind, to extend some little kindness to these poor servants of ours? They have been deprived of their inheritance of freedom, in order that they may minister to our needs. It seems only fair that we should recompense them in some way for what they have lost.

* * * * *

I will now refer to one final consideration, which seems to me the strongest of all. We have no right to exclude anything which God has made from the benefits of Christ's redemption. In a very different degree, of course, but not the less really, the brute creation must have its share in that immeasurably great event—must have its share, directly, perhaps, but indirectly, beyond all doubt. It is simply incredible that any one whose spirit has been enlightened by the Spirit of Christ, whose will has been brought into living contact with the mind of Christ, could deliberately act with cruelty or selfishness or want of consideration, even to an animal. Ask yourselves this question. However high an opinion you might have formed of the character of any one, would he not instantly sink in your esteem—would you not feel at once, and rightly feel, that you had been mistaken in him—if you ascertained that he had been guilty of cruelty to a brute beast that was dependent upon him, yes, or to any animal under any circumstances? You would know at once that he could not be a genuine Christian.

Now, I venture to say that this sentiment—this scrupulousness, this refinement of sentiment, if you please—"derives from what we have the likeliest God within the soul." William Blake, a poet who wrote in the closing years of the last century, expresses that view with much force:

"Can I see another's woe
And not be in sorrow too?
Can I see another's grief
And not seek for kind relief?

* * * * *
And can He who smiles on all,
Hear the wren with sorrows small,
Hear the small bird's grief and care,
Hear the woes that infants bear,
And not sit beside the nest,
Pouring pity in their breast,
And not sit the cradle near,
Weeping tear on infant's tear?"

No sentient being is outside the scope of God's loving compassion; and those are most like God who discern a sanctity in everything that He has made, whose kindness of heart refuses to shut itself up within any conventional limits.

Let me add a word or two, that I may run no risk of being misunderstood. I know well that you are averse to cruelty, whatever form it may assume, and that deliberate cruelty to an animal would be resented strongly by you all. But be on your guard lest these subordinate members of the universal family, called into being by the same Divine Power which created you, should suffer through your thoughtless neglect or blind conformity to some prevailing fashion. In matters of this kind, it is for those who have been educated, to form, not to follow, public opinion. And the treatment of animals even in this country—their treatment not by the lower classes only—still leaves much to be desired.

The Word "Catholic"

PERHAPS there is no word in the English language that is so generally misunderstood and wrongly used as the word "Catholic," unless it is the word "Gospel," which nowadays may mean anything. This being the case, it may not be out of place to present some thoughts on the meaning and use of the word "Catholic," which we hope may be helpful and suggestive.

I. The word Catholic was very early adopted as descriptive of the Church founded by our Lord and His Apostles. It means universal or embracing all. In this sense the Church is Catholic in these three things: (1) It is for all people; (2) It teaches all the Gospel; and (3) It endures throughout all ages. This distinguishes the Christian Church from the old Jewish Church, which was but temporal, local, national. The Christian Church is for all time, for all places, for all people; and by reason of this it was always, from the beginning, described in the Creed as Catholic. In fact, this is the only word that can describe it. When, then, we say in the Creed, "I believe in the Holy, Catholic Church," we confess that the Church to which we belong is not simply a little Episcopalian sect, but a part or branch of that ancient, historic Church which has been preserved as an outward, visible organization from the day of Christ down to the present time, and that the ancient heritage of the Faith, the Sacraments, and the Ministry has been handed down to us inviolate.

II. The word Catholic is used as being descriptive of the orthodoxy of any particular Church or individual, as being in agreement with the one, undivided Church which has expressed itself in the Ecumenical or General Councils.

III. The word is also used to describe that which is believed on the authority of the Church; as, for example, the doctrine of the Blessed Trinity is a Catholic doctrine because it is the universally accepted teaching of the Church and having the sure warrant of Holy Scripture.

From this threefold usage, we learn that the word "Catholic," is a very significant term, and sets forth the real nature of the Church as an institution, as being (1) The conservator of the Faith, "the pillar and ground of the Truth;" and (2) As the instrumentality whereby we become partakers of the benefits of Christ's "precious Death and Sacrifice," which was offered "for the sins of the whole world." It will also enable us to test our orthodoxy, to know whether we are "loyal and true," in accord with "the Faith once delivered to the saints," and, without doubt, will save us from being "carried away with every blast of vain doctrine."

This word, then, so greatly misunderstood, so wrongly used, yet meaning what it does, touching all the circumference of evangelic truth and ensuring its full presentation, surely this word of all words in our language ought to be used with thoughtful care. As expressive of our hopes, as the embodiment of our heritage, we will not import into it any meaning which ignores or treats slightly or gives away our birthright. We will not ignore its true meaning. For intelligent Churchmen the term "Catholic Church" should not mean, nor be used to mean, simply the Roman Church, but rather that glorious Body in which we declare our belief when we say in the Creed, "I believe in the Holy, Catholic Church."—The Diocese of Tennessee.

Letters to the Editor

THE USE OF INCENSE

To the Editor of The Living Church:

Will you allow a few words regarding the use of incense in the Church, from a source outside of your own Communion? It appears to me that the entire treatment of the matter is defective from the failure to recognize the true symbolic significance of its use. The fountain and source of all symbolic ritual is the Mosaic tabernacle and its rites and ceremonies. In this service it was the office of the priest at the time of the morning and evening sacrifice, when he trimmed and lighted the lamps in the golden candlestick, to burn incense upon the golden altar. The law for the composition of the incense was very precise, defining the ingredients and the quantity of each, which we must suppose were significant, as every thing else was, of spiritual realities. Incense was not used, as some seem to suppose, to sweeten the air, nor as it is used in the Roman Catholic service, to do honor to persons and things. The significance of it is brought out in the Apocalypse, when in more than one instance it is mentioned as "the prayers of the saints." Thus regarded, it is the symbol of intercession, and when burned and waved before the altar at the time of intercession in the Eucharist or intercessory prayers, it is the symbol of the Holy Spirit interceding in the Church (Romans viii: 26), and represents the "groanings which cannot be uttered," which in this unspoken form ascend to God in the name of the great Intercessor, Christ Jesus. The suggestion which I see made in a letter in The Churchman of last week, that the pleasant smell contributes to the sincerity or completeness of the worship, is a thought too entirely fleshly to be allowed to enter into any conception of a spiritual worship. DIVINITY SCHOOLS FOR COLORED MEN

To the Editor of The Living Church:

I was much interested in "Presbyter's" letter in this week's issue, concerning work among the colored people of the South. In my humble judgment no greater work is commanding our attention than this, right at our doors. But the writer is sadly mistaken in supposing that a colored man is welcomed to pursue his studies at our divinity schools. He can do so at the General Theological Seminary, but cannot do so at Sewanee, Tenn., nor at Alexandria, Va. This fact ought to be more generally known. South of the Mason and Dixon line the old prejudice of Peter and Cornelius is a stern reality.

COLLEGE STUDENTS

To the Editor of The Living Church:

It may not be generally known by your readers that the Brotherhood of St. Andrew has a standing committee on "Work in Colleges." It is one of the duties of this committee to gather the names of young men in general, and of Churchmen in particular, who are about to enter, or are returning to, college. So far as practicable, these names are forwarded to Brotherhood men in the several colleges, who will be glad to call upon new-comers, render them any possible assistance in finding suitable lodgings, introduce them to other students, and generally endeavor to be of service.

A year ago you kindly printed a communication from this committee, which has resulted in the receipt of the names of a number of young men returning to, or about to enter, college, with whom cordial relations have been established by members of the Brotherhood and other Churchmen.

There are now chapters of the Brotherhood in, or in close touch with, the following universities and colleges: Harvard, Yale, Columbia, Pennsylvania, Hobart, Kenyon, Cornell, Dartmouth, Washington and Lee, Brown, Stanford, Roanoke, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, and the State universities of Michigan, North Carolina, West Virginia, Virginia, Minnesota, Kansas, and California.

I would therefore invite the reverend clergy and other readers of THE LIVING CHURCH to send to the committee, if they are so disposed, the following information concerning young men of their parishes or acquaintance who at this time may be entering or returning to college: Name in full (with class and local address, if any); whether a Churchman; whether a communicant; whether a member of the Brotherhood; any information which might enable a fellow-student to understand how he could best be of use to the man upon whom he calls.

The committee would prefer to have the privilege of using the names of those from whom the names of students are received, but will not do so if the correspondent objects.

As the first few weeks of a new student's residence in college often determine his friendships and the character of his life for his entire course, it is important that those wishing to communicate with the committee should do so at once. Address "The College Committee," Brotherhood of St. Andrew, 281 Fourth ave., New York.

GIFFORD PINCHOT,

New York, Sept. 16, 1899.

Secretary.

To the Editor of The Living Church:

Clergymen and men interested in Churchmen entering Harvard University would do the St. Paul's Society a great favor if they would send the names of such young men to the secretary, George W. Smith, 3 College House, Cambridge, Mass.

More of Christ

BY MARGARET DOORIS

More of Christ's life,
To lift the standard of this earthly life
Beyond the struggle and the sordid strife.

More of Christ's love,
To sanctify always our human love,
And make it worthy of the life above.

More of Christ's zeal,
More of His sympathy for other's weal,
More of His spirit all our acts to seal.

From day to day,
More of Christ's truth, lest we should go astray,
To guide our feet along the narrow way.

O Christ, bend low,
On us the fullness of Thy help bestow,
Till in Thy likeness we may daily grow.

Oh, give us grace,
Nobler to live, whate'er our rank or place,
And fit us hour by hour to see Thy face.

London, Ohio.

Obituary

IN MEMORIAM

DAVID CORHAM ROBINSON

At a meeting of the Board of Missions of the Diocese of Western Michigan, held on Sept. 6th, 1899, upon motion, it was resolved that,

WHEREAS, it has pleased God in His all-wise providence to take unto Himself the soul of our beloved friend and associate, David Gorham Robinson, who entered into rest July 19th, 1899, in the 89th year of his age; therefore be it

Resolved: That in the death of David Gorham Robinson, the Board of Missions, the Bishop of the diocese, and the Church in Western Michigan, mourn the loss of an exemplary Churchman and a faithful colleague in all good work. It is fitting to make reverent record of a life so distinguished in the Church, and we would therefore, herein, give expression to our estimate of his exceeding value as a man and a Churchman, and bear witness to our personal share in a sorrow which we and the entire diocese have sustained by his death.

Resolved: That we have lost one of our most efficient members; one whose just and generous judgment, whose courtesy of heart, wise counsel, and delicate sense of honor, have ever commanded our esteem and admiration, and endeared him with growing affection to all.

Resolved: That, while we accept death as a part of God's love, God's care, and God's plan, yet, without the intent of intrusion upon the sacredness of their great sorrow, we, the Bishop and the Board of Missions, would tender to the bereaved family our sense of great personal loss in this day of separation, and our deep Christian sympathy in their bereavement.

Resolved: That we herein express our unfeigned regard and affection for the departed, whose noble and just soul was given with singular fidelity to the service of God, the extension of his Church, and the good of his fellow-men. The Church is richer to-day for his unaffected and manly life, and we, his associates, are provoked unto good works for his example of loyalty to his Bishop, the diocese, and the Church. His memory is a tender one to all, and we follow his soul with the prayers of the Church he loved and served so well.

Resolved: That the secretary of the Board be directed to communicate a copy of these resolutions to the bereaved widow and daughter, and to the offices of The Churchman, THE LIVING CHURCH, and The Helper, for publication.

Resolved: That the secretary be directed to enter these resolutions upon the records of the Board of Missions.

Appeals

(Legal title [for use in making wills]: THE DOMESTIC AND FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY OF THE PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH IN THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.)

Domestic missions in seventeen missionary districts and forty-one home dioceses: missions among the colored people; missions among the Indians; foreign missions in China, Japan, Africa, Greece, and Haiti; support of the clergyman of this Church appointed to counsel and guide the presbyters and readers in Mexico.

Provision must be made for the salaries and traveling expenses of twenty-four bishops, and stipends of 1,700 missionary workers, besides the support of schools, orphanages, and hospitals. Contributions are, moreover, asked specifically for the salaries of workers and support of schools in Mexico. One thousand dollars per month is the estimate of such expenses.

Berenice

BY SAMUEL DONALD NEWTON

The long Judean day draws to a close;
The shadows lengthen out; the blazing sun
Is sinking in the west, his labors done;
And on the Dead Sea's waves the new moon glows,
While over Bethlehem, see, one by one,
With faintest glow and twinkle, lo, the stars
Proclaim one more day's course is nearly run;
The while the planet Mars
Doth cast his ruddy glow o'er Calvary's hill.
And now the night is fallen; all is deathly still.

Behold a scene of want and woe,
For ruthless death and carnage, hand in hand,
The dogs of cruel war, a horrid band,
Have made their home on ancient Zion's hill;
A haughty Roman chief, the Jews' worst foe,
Has placed his clutches on the lonely land;
Siloam's healing pool is choked with sand,
And stopped is Kedron's rill;
The city's walls are black and sullied o'er;
Moriah's Mount the holy temple crowns no more.

In desert and in lifeless solitude
The city lies, forsaken of all men;
No living thing is near; but look again,
One woman there in loneliness doth brood.
Her glossy locks unkempt and fluttering;
Her one long garment, made of sackcloth crude,
From top to toe now torn in tumult rude,
She wildly off doth fling,
And in the ashes throws her trembling frame,
In utter grief, unheeded of the burning shame.

Have pity, stranger; look not lightly on,
Nor think of scorning what thou seest there;
Remember, pain and woe are everywhere.
What if the past be sinful? Now 'tis gone
And cannot be recalled; and couldst thou bear
Aught more than she? Ah then, beware, beware,
How thou dost question. List how in her woe
And agony below

Her sad lament and plaint she doth begin,
And calls upon her God to pardon her for sin:

"Jerusalem, my own Jerusalem!
That I should bring on thee this bitter pain,
This anguish, this destruction! I would fain
I ne'er had lived! Oh Jesu, oh my God,
Come down from off Thy throne in heaven broad,
Reclaim, reclaim, thy purest, brightest gem,
Thine ancient town, Thine own Jerusalem;
Retread where thou hast trod,
And right the wrongful deed. Oh, pity me,
For now I know Thou'rt God, though once I doubted Thee.

"I was a Hebrew maid, a princess too;
In face and form was fair to look upon
As ever yet was child of Terah's son—
So men proclaimed; alas, that pride should brew
In Jewish child such bitter burning shame
As wrought in me the deed that, done,
Can never be undone. 'Tis mine the blame,
'Tis mine the thankless name

Of having brought on David's hapless town
This woful wrong, that I might win another's crown.

"I sought the Roman chief, despite the law
That Jewess must not cling to Gentile lord;
Became his mistress—oh, the bitter word—
Released my jewel, clutching at the straw
Of earthly pomp and pride and lordly power;
I thought to rule through him some little hour,
To make him answer to my nod and beck
(And now behold the wreck);
My people's righteous cause I did forsake, Forgot my father's God. Oh that my heart would break!

"I listened heedless to the gruesome plan
That ended in thy ruin, blessed town;
I cared not; gave no signal, word, or frown,
To save mine own, although a nod from me,
A little word, one gesture of my fan,
To show that I approved not, would have wrought
A change and set the holy city free.
Alas, and did I naught?

I left the city helpless to its fate;
I let the deed be done—repentance came too late.

"And now my master, master of the world,
Has set aside his pretty Jewish toy;
My grief-struck, tear-stained face seemed to annoy
Where once it pleased; so, downward am I hurled,
And down, down, down unto the depths of woe,
And deeper depths, if such a thing there be,
Behold me fall, behold my spirit go;
Lord Jesus, pity me;
Have mercy on the traitress, Gracious One;
Have mercy on the worst of sinners, Suffering Son."

The voice hath ceased its bitter moan,
And deeper grow the shadows and the dark,
And deeper grows the silence—not a groan
Disturbs the stillness of the night—but hark!
That gentle wind proclaims an angel near,
The faintest rustle of his wings I hear,
As downward slips he from the heavenly throne,
And whispers: "Do not fear,"
Unto the soul in trouble and in woe;
And more I cannot tell, for more I do not know.

THE Chicago Tribune reports gifts to colleges, seminaries, academies, and art institutes, for the first half of the present year, to be $30,000,000, a sum for such purposes never before equalled in double the time.

THE Duke of Beaufort has definitely decided to have Chepstow Castle put up to auction early in October. This is one of the first five Norman castles built in the reign of William the Conqueror. During the Parliamentary War, the inhabitants of the town adhered firmly to the royal cause, and the castle was not surrendered to the Parliamentarian forces till after a vigorous siege, in which it sustained considerable damage. On the restoration of Charles II., Henry Marten, one of those who sat in judgment on Charles I., was confined in it till his death.

A CERTAIN curate was of a painfully nervous temperament, and in consequence was constantly making awkward remarks—intended as compliments—to the bishop and others. Having distinguished himself in an unusual degree during a gathering of clergy at an afternoon tea at the bishop's palace, he was taken to task for his failings by a senior curate who was one of his companions on his way home. "Look here, Bruce," said the senior, decidedly, "you are a donkey. Why cannot you keep quiet instead of making your asinine remarks?" I am speaking to you now as a brother—" Loud laughter interrupted him at this point, and for a moment he wondered why.—Collier's Weekly.

THE Japanese courts of justice, since the beginning of July, 1899, have been completely re-organized. There is now a supreme court, seven courts of appeal, forty-nine provincial high courts, 298 county courts, 1,201 local magistrates. The legal code, modeled chiefly after the German, has been translated into English by a German professor of law, Dr. Lonholm. The objection to the English and American system was that it is not definite enough, favors too much the rich and powerful, and opens the door to corruption. Such, at least, was the verdict of the eminent Japanese lawyers who for nearly twenty years sifted the laws of the world to find a code suited to their country. Curiously enough, the German code, a work of excessively slow growth, will not take full effect until 1900, or a year later than the Japanese code which has been shaped after it.

IT is said that Elias Howe almost beggared himself before he discovered where the eye of the sewing-machine needle should be located. How he finally hit upon the right idea is told by a contributor to The Textile World, as follows:

His [Howe's] original idea was to follow the model of the ordinary needle, and have the eye at the heel. It never occurred to him that it should be placed near the point, and he might have failed altogether if he had not dreamed he was building a sewing-machine for a savage king in a strange country. Just then, in his actual waking experience, he was perplexed about the needle's eye. He thought the king gave him twenty-four hours to complete the machine and make it sew. If not finished in that time, death was to be the punishment. Howe worked and worked, and puzzled and puzzled, and finally gave it up. Then he thought he was taken out to be executed. He noticed that the warriors carried spears that were pierced near the head. Instantly came the solution of the difficulty, and while the inventor was begging for time, he awoke. It was four o'clock in the morning. He jumped out of bed, ran to his workshop, and by nine o'clock a needle with an eye at the point had been rudely modeled. After that it was easy. That is the true story of an important incident in the invention of the sewing machine, and worth recording.

A GALESBURG man tells of a little boy who went to church on a recent Sunday and was greatly interested in the collection. He watched the ushers for a time, then whispered to his father: "Papa, more'n half the folks has got in free."

WHAT is the best epitaph written in English within this century? The literary paragrapher of The Pall Mall Gazette maintains that it is one which its author, the Primate of Ireland, sometime Bishop of Derry, had inscribed on the wall of Derry cathedral in commemoration of a young curate. Here it is:

"Down through our crowded walks and closer air,
O friend, how beautiful thy footsteps were!
When through the fever's fire at last they trod,
A form was with them like the Son of God.
'Twas but one step for those victorious feet
From their day's path unto the golden street;
And we who watched their walk, so bright, so brief,
Have marked this marble with our hope and grief."

WHILE "David Harum" is a book without a religious motive, it is doubtless "true to life," or to the kind of life which it portrays. The old banker is a man of some faults and of many virtues. Among the latter, piety is hardly to be reckoned, yet we believe the author would have found some fear of God in David's eccentric character if he had had a little more of it in his own. However this may be, his quaint observation on preachers and preaching is entertaining, and possibly may be instructive. Lenox and he were discussing the Episcopal rector in Homeville:

"Putty nice kind of a man," remarked David when John came back; "putty nice kind of a man. 'Bout the only 'quaintance you've made of his kind, ain't he? Wa'al, he's all right fur's he goes. Comes of good stock, I'm told, an' looks it. Runs a good deal to emptins in his preachin', tho, they say. How do you find him?"

"I think I enjoy his conversation more than his sermons," admitted John with a smile.

"'Less of it at times, ain't the?' " suggested David. "I may have told ye," he continued, "that I wa'n't a very reg'lar church-goer, but I've ben more or less in my time, an' when I did listen to the sermon all through, it gen'ally seemed to me that if the preacher 'd put all the' really was in it together, he wouldn't need to have took only 'bout quarter the time; but what with scorin' fer a start, an' laggin' on the back stretch, an' ev'ry now an' then breakin' to a stan'still, I gen'ally wanted to come down out o' the stand before the race was over. The's a good many fast quarter hosses" remarked Mr. Harum, "but them that c'n keep it up fer a full mile is source."

A Cape Cod Diversion

FOR quiet and rest, no place is better adapted than the extreme end of Cape Cod. Beyond the little village of Orleans, the country puts on a rough exterior, and in many respects is not unlike a Western prairie. Here and there, a few houses are scattered away from the little towns, and break up the monotony of the long stretches of land, which sometimes are nothing better than sand heaps and only occasionally round off into an undulating field, with a few cows browsing as if duly conscious of the limitations that nature had placed upon their prospect. Thoreau footed these places many years ago, and has left his impressions in a volume of delightful descriptions. To return to them is only to find that few and far have the changes been. For weeks I have been living in comparative seclusion, with nothing but the broad Atlantic roaring at my feet, and the companionship of a lighthouse a stone's throw away. The mariner knows the spot as the Nanset Three Lights. These three lights are a teaching symbol to every sailor. One light stands for Highland light, two for Chatham light, and now three for Nanset light, and nightly I have three glaring lights standing out before me, making a shrine out of the spot, and of course at times carrying my thoughts to other mysterious truths which are good companions in meditations, and an excellent cordial for drooping spirits.

Here, on this beach, where every wave at high tide threatens vengeance, came ashore after last November storms, many sad reminders of the destruction of the "Portland." Eleven bodies were cast up by the sea, and, I was told by the life-saving men, their faces bore unmistakable signs of intense suffering. Life preservers came ashore without their companions, and one that I held in my hand a few days ago, showed that the fury of the storm had snapped the strap encasing the body, and even in this one could easily read a story of struggle and despair. Old wrecks are now and then unearthed in the sand, and dead fish provide a sumptuous meal for the sand flea who takes his color from his environment, but is a most tantalizing creature to look at, for he is cross-eyed. The seashore abounds in these creatures at times, and they enjoy life with impunity, for when they are not hopping around you, they are apparently taking a siesta in that well-made home of theirs in the sand.

Unlike the sand-peep, the sand flea has a few enemies. This little bird, which loves the lowlands, and leaves such pretty foot-steps behind on the sand, has always a checkered life, and gets little peace after July 15th. Gunners prowl around in the vicinity of the shore at low tide, and carry away dozens of these little creatures, and when they are gone they are certainly missed—more so than the shrieking mackerel gull who is well protected by law, and whose unpopularity turns out to be his blessing. Ducks alight here and there, but keep a measured distance. A day or two ago one ventured near the shore and gave the appearance of being a friendly visitor, but his approach was a temptation to the man with a gun, and the poor shot is now upon record.

There are no woods near this shore, but a few stunted pine trees which grow about four feet high, and then the top branches are lopped off with these winds. Such winds are no better than cyclones. It is impossible to keep your patience, much less your temper, with the wind from the shore. It is neither hot nor cold, but like the works of the Laodiceans, lukewarm. It is a constant blow for twenty-four hours, and even the short walk bears testimony that the wind is mistress of all it surveys, for everything is swept and flapped by its movements. The wild cranberry flourishes and is useless. A quack medicine firm in one of the large cities gathers tons of it, and makes a decoction for some disease, which retails at one dollar a pint bottle. There is the indigo plant with a yellow blossom, always fine contrast to the poverty grass which diversifies the waste places in the sand. This has great healing properties, I am told.

During the night as one hears the roaring of the waves sweeping along the shore, there comes beating from the plain the sharp, quick bark of the fox. It is rather a pleasant sound to mingle with the deep moanings of the ocean, but a hard one to trace. These sly creatures make nightly raids upon the hen-coop, and every day this part of our provision box grows miserably less. Occasionally a few fall into the trap, and then our indignation is often turned to pity.

Beyond Barnstable there is no church building of our own. In truth, people seem to be very wary of anything religious. At Eastham I saw the spot where a party of the Pilgrim Fathers landed from Plymouth in 1644. It is wild now and has not changed much since that year. There is a deserted grove at North Eastham, where the Methodists held their camp-meeting before the days of the railroad. It is now a veritable oasis in this wilderness of sand.

But when the summer visitor takes up his abode here, and is willing to endure the pointed claims of these mosquitoes, he will soon change many of these sights. No place affords a more charming view of the Atlantic than the Nanset Three Lights. Here to the north one may at times discern the form of the ocean greyhound, and daily there pass in front of you sailing crafts of all kinds. The "Fruiters" going south, with the long procession of coal barges nearer shore, preceded by a struggling tug, all indicate the life upon the ocean when the shore is

"as silent as a nun." I chanced upon a colony of priests here from the Roman Church, who are quietly enjoying a rest and have thrown off somewhat the formality of their profession. A jolly set of men they were, walking up and down the shore, with bare feet and head, at times bending their attention to their books of devotions, with intervals of conversation, rife with merriment, and often competing for your attention.

The lighthouse keeper is a genial, well-disposed man. He is apparently anxious to study you before committing any of his fund of information into your care. He knows the sea and its antics very well, and the "ships that pass in the night," he knows them well too. But the utter loneliness of his life impresses you, and while this is not felt in summer, during the long, bleak winter it must be his incubus. Even to glance at him now, and watch him in the performance of his varied duties, makes you anticipate all this in the days when the severe northeast-wind whistles around his solitary abode, and the snow blocks his only egress to the scattered hamlet two miles away.

How suggestive is the sea! "There shall be no more sea." To watch it is to deepen your mind with mystery. If one resents mysterious truths, let him recline before this vast expanse of ocean, and muse upon the mysteries of the deep. It is no wonder that fishermen were the first Apostles. Fishermen are always impressed with mysteries; their calling fixes these well in mind, and with them to doubt mysteries is akin to doubting facts. People who live in cities should sometimes come to the bleak ocean shore, with daily missions upon the deep, that they may realize that there is a lining of mystery to all that is seen and heard by the rush and tear, the ebb and flow of these strong tides.

In the wilderness of this spot, with the rough aspect of nature touching every corner and crevice, with the little swallow burrowing into the cliff and making a home for itself in nature's warmest clothing, one may easily find the rest and relaxation for a tired brain, and awake from the spell to renewed energies for work elsewhere.

'Yankee Doodle

"YANKEE DOODLE," according to a writer in the Cincinnati Commercial Tribune, has had a long and varied history. He says: "'Yankee Doodle' is one of the oldest songs in the world, and at different periods of an unparalleled career has belonged to England, to the once vast empire of Holland, and to the Roman Catholic Church, where it probably originated somewhere about the year 1200 A.D. If you happen to be a musician and do not believe that such an undignified ditty could ever have been intended for religious purposes, play it over on a pipe organ very simply and slowly, and as the majesty of a grand old papal chant fills your soul, all your doubts will vanish away.

"Several hundred years ago the good people of Holland thought so much of 'Yankee Doodle,' that they adopted the tune for the harvest song, and made up new words for it. Mary Mapes Dodge gives one of the verses in 'Hans Brinker':

'Yanker didee dudle down,
Didee dudle launter,
Yankæ viver vooover vown,
Botermelt und taunter.'

"Soon after first being sung, this quaint verse became so popular among all classes in Holland that it became a truly national song. It was sung in livelier time than the old chant which it supplanted.

"One of the latest and aptest historical—if least literary—versions of 'Yankee Doodle,' is a stanza said to have been sung by some of the Rough Riders in Cuba after the surrender of Santiago. It ran something like this:

'Yankee Doodle came to town
Wearing striped pants on,
But Spain she saw so many stars
That now they need expansion'

"'Yankee Doodle' has already belonged to the three great families of the Caucasian race [sic—the Latin, the Teutonic, and the Anglo-Saxon. In seven centuries it has been carried into the heart of four of the greatest political powers of history."

Life in Puerto Rico

SAN JUAN, PUERTO RICO, Aug. 16, 1899.

MY DEAR LIVING CHURCH:—It has occurred to me that I would write to all my Church friends through your paper. So many want a letter from Puerto Rico, that a general one written on interesting topics might be read by others who have not had a personal interest in the mission of our Church to this island.

The all-absorbing topic to us now is the fearful hurricane that we passed through last Tuesday. While sitting on our veranda Monday evening, enjoying the beautiful air and cool breeze from the sea, a policeman appeared at our Puerto Rican neighbor's opposite, and rattled off a lot of Spanish which seemed to excite the whole family, and a large one, too. I said: "Something seems to disturb them." He had come to tell them that the signal flags were up to tell of a hurricane coming. We had no worry. We retired early, slept soundly till two A. M., when we heard it raining and blowing. I did not feel anxious until about five A. M., when we got up and dressed, and as soon as it grew light enough to see out, we were appalled at seeing natives running in the street as if for shelter; then roofs and timber began to fly. We called our cook up to prepare our breakfast. The house began to shake so we concluded we would have to leave it. All the cottages are set on posts or cement pillars, and give one any feeling but that of security. We had prayers, then our coffee and eggs. The storm was now changing from a gale to a hurricane, with a lull in between tremendous gusts. We decided to run across the street to a low cottage occupied by an American commissary clerk. We all sat with wraps on, ready to run out and take our chances in the street, though the sight out there was anything but reassuring. Coconut trees, with their long branches straight out; almond trees twisted off at the top as if they were nothing; roofs blowing all around us. We began to feel as if the island itself had broken loose and was plowing over billows, the ocean roared so dreadfully. Finally a lull came to us about ten A. M., when the wind veered to another point, and then we felt we had been spared a fearful death. We live in the suburb of San Juan, called San Turce, about four miles out. Our experience was different from that of the city, and rather rougher, for we had the trees and open country to give a greater sweep. We now find, from all reports, we had it very mild compared to the fearful conditions of other parts of the island. I had written to a friend that we found that the Spaniards had twisted everything wrong down here except the island. I believe I can now say that the "island" seems twisted. Suffering will necessarily follow such a storm, for all nature is destroyed—orange crop, coffee orchards, sugar plantations, and fruit trees. Nature rebounds quickly, but each has a season for its growth. We are mourning the loss of oranges, for they are so luscious. Bananas take six months, and are a staple diet for the very poor. The destruction of the plantations of coffee, sugar, and so on, will cause Spain to growl, for much of this island, in a money-making way, is still in her hands, or rather in a few rich landowners' hands. Some one has said that this was an American hurricane, for we are wonderfully preserved; not an American killed in Ponce, where was the centre of the storm. The handsome $60,000 statue of Columbus, in San Juan, lost its right hand holding a large flag of Spain.

We went out next day to view the destruction round us. I could not realize that we had been so torn asunder; I now feel how mercifully we were preserved. We thank God, and take fresh courage.

The daily life here is an out-door one, for we sit with blinds all thrown open to catch every bit of breeze and sunlight we can. Verandas, front and back, are a great comfort. Only one-story cottages, about 15 ft. high; no carpets, few articles of furniture; iron beds with nets. Our servants are colored, English-speaking, who come from neighboring islands owned by the English. They talk Spanish, also, and are good and loyal interpreters, for they love the Americans and dislike the Puerto Ricans. We have funny times buying from our vendors who come daily with our living. Eggs are always in demand. Vegetables of all kinds, but so crude—everything needs cultivation. Chickens in quantities, prices vary. Ponies loaded on each side with coconuts for the "Agua." Good-sized cabbages, marrows, and gumbo. The native sugar is coarse, but pure and sweet; reminds one of what rock candy would be if pounded up, it takes time to dissolve it. Tomatoes abound, but small in size. Lettuce is very good. Peppers of all kinds. Coffee is so different from what we are accustomed to, we have to learn to love it. Meats and groceries have been a trial; we had to send to New York for the latter. We are among the few outside of the commissary, and hence have to deal directly with Spanish trade, and find they buy our poorest grades. All they consider is the cost, not the quality. One American firm which has started here, finds it hard in the wholesale line to sell a good grade of goods. We haven't appreciated paying duty on our home goods, but we have to do it, and feel vexed. The Puerto Ricans are what the Spaniard has made them, down trodden and unable to make a bargain that they will keep. You plan for thus and so, but when you settle, they demand more. They think we are padded with American dollars, so they charge accordingly. We make the bargain and never budge from it. We never pay the price they ask, but generally end by giving our price.

Only teachers and missionaries are needed, but they are very much needed. Pray that they may come to the Church's help with hearts willing to battle for the cause of Christ. Observation of a day of rest is unknown. My neighbors wash, iron, fuss, quarrel, and live as they do the other six days. They watch us from their verandas going off to service, amused at our not buying on that day, when it really is the big day for the vendors. Americans encourage the custom by buying from them, and say: "Why, you have to live." I find that with ice, I can plan here as I did at home, and never think of going over the rule "not to buy on Sunday." Bread is made all over the island in large bakeries, as at home—good Vienna bread and rolls. Spain adopted this way, for there are only a few ovens in private homes; charcoal ranges have only small holes. We use a tin oven from an oil stove over the charcoal, and we bake well any and everything in this way. We brought a fine oil stove, the automatic blue flame, but it stands idle for want of oil. We have to pay 275 pesos, or $1.65 in our money, for what they call five gallons, four and three quarters as we measure. The commissary have five gallons for 60 cents. The shopping in the dry-goods stores is the most trying to me—all Spanish, and such a display of cheap cotton fabrics! Their measures are similar to the oil measures—a yard is three quarters; when you demur, they bring out: "Americano yard stick," but not until you have fussed. I said to a young St. Thomas' clerk—English-speaking: "Haven't you an American brand of thread? I do not care for the English." "Why, all you have in the States is from England." We came very near having a scene. I was telling one of our officers the answer to my question. He said: "Why didn't you tell him all his old matchetes come from Connecticut."

Linens of all grades are bargains here, and are being bought up by the Americans. One or two American stores have opened up, but do not seem very attractive to one who has lived in Philadelphia and Chicago, and understands Field's and Wanamaker's large stores. I am told these stores hide their best, and not till you are well known can you get them to bring forward their goods for your inspection. They all go on the same plan, "Mananna," or to-morrow. A vender comes in with two large baskets, sits himself down as if he was so glad to be just there, and then waits. Offers you a cabbage for thirty centavos; you say: "No, no;" he grunts and waits; you appear indifferent; he then says twenty-five—you still appear in the same mood, but say twenty centavos; he then gets up and goes, but soon turns, comes back and you have it. At first we paid their price, but we soon found our mistake. My cook Margaret is a fine specimen of a good, sensible, motherly woman; she says: "Mistress, God will show these people how good the Americanos are to them from this storm, that He will let them know the government they are under now is far superior to Spain."

I shall be glad to tell you at another time more of daily rounds on this beautiful island.

Book Reviews and Notices

Reminiscences. By Justin McCarthy, M.P., Author of "A History of Our Own Times," etc. Two vols. New York and London: Harper & Bros. 1899.

This is altogether one of the most genial and delightful books of the year. The author who, during the course of a long public career has met almost every one worth knowing, and has been on terms of intimacy or friendship with many of them, has conferred a favor upon the multitude of readers everywhere, by publishing these reminiscences of the eminent men and women of two generations. "My only claim upon the reader's attention," the author modestly says, "is that I have known them, and that I endeavor to tell him faithfully the impression they produced on me." But this is by no means Mr. McCarthy's only claim upon the reader's attention. He is a keen critic, though genial and kindly always, and eschewing trivial personalities. He is a discernor of character, and possesses a fine sense of humor—needless to remark this of a cultured Irishman. His mind is susceptible to vivid impressions, and his retentive memory enables him to revivify the past, so that we seem to move with him in the society of days long dead and forgotten. His style is easy, charming in its freshness—the style of the lecturer, or rather, of the engaging conversationalist who affords his guest an hour or two of profitable pleasure by his discourse of men, opinions, and movements.

And what a galaxy of great names is here! Dickens, Thackeray, Tennyson, Browning, Cobden, Bright, John Stuart Mill, Lowell, Emerson, Holmes, Longfellow, Howells, John Boyle O'Reilly, Sumner, Walt Whitman, Generals Grant, Sheridan, and Custer; George Eliot, Dean Stanley, Jowett, O'Connell, Matthew Arnold, Geo. Meredith, Lord John and Lady Russell, Charles Reade and Anthony Trollope, Lord Randolph Churchill, Prince Napoleon, known as "Plon-plon," Charles Stewart Parnell, the two Kingsleys; a whole chapter full of prominent actors, including our own Joseph Jefferson; Cardinal Manning, Rudyard Kipling, and Mr. Gladstone! We have not mentioned half of those about whom the author has something interesting to say—the statesmen, warriors, poets, novelists, philosophers, litterateurs, scientists, members of Parliament, painters, foreign exiles, Churchmen and laymen, Catholics, Protestants, Dissenters, Positivists, and everybody else. The only class with whom the author does not seem to have been familiar is the navy. To some of these famous men an entire chapter is devoted, elsewhere a group of them is considered, e. g., "Some Memoirs of the Stage"; "Men of Light and Leading," Huxley, Richard Owen, Tyndall, Herbert Spencer, James Martineau, Holyoake, and Bradlaugh; and "Some Irish Members," a particularly amusing chapter. We have enjoyed the chapters on "The English Positivists" and "The Kingsleys" as examples of good criticism, and that on "Prince Napoleon" as a remarkable study of character, which will give a shock of surprise to the ordinary student of contemporary history.

But it is not necessary to go farther into detail, and, indeed, it is hardly possible. Every one who is interested in the men and affairs of our own age, in England and America, will read these volumes with delight, and will mentally thank the author for the pleasure and the information he has given. The author's sympathetic, lively interest in every one whom he met, the breadth of view with which he regards all sorts of movements and every state and condition of society and human life, and his charity and liberality in judging them, are helpful and instructive, as well as refreshing. It is easy to be laudator temporis acti, but how few are capable of forming a just and well balanced judgment of the men and measures of their own times!

Japan in Transition. A Comparative Study of the Progress, Policy, and Methods of the Japanese since Their War with China. By Stafford Ransome. New York and London: Harper & Bros. 1899. Price, $3.

The author, an Englishman, the correspondent of two great London newspapers, has spent two years in Japan, and gives us the result of his keen and practical observations in this readable and interesting book. He places before us the national life of Japan and its varied relations to modern civilization; its awakening to the fact that it had something to learn from nations that it conceived of as outside Western barbarians; its determinedly settling itself to learn the wisdom of the West; its remarkable progress in this respect; its thirst for intellectual and practical culture, and the marvelous use it has made of its opportunities, as witnessed by its late successful war with China. One sees this, as in a magic glass, when looking at the frontispiece of the book, which represents a railway train, in full Western equipment, speeding across the country, while in the background the snow-capped cone of Japan's sacred mountain lifts its head. One sees this advance, also, in the picture of the grand Japanese ironclad battleship, "Shikishima," the most powerful war-ship in the world, built at the Thames Iron Works. These represent startling phases of what is called progress. The lesson of modern means and methods has been well learned. It is true that the old Japan still exists, but it is bound to die, or, at least, so we conjecture. The new Japan has scarcely been born yet, save in spirit, but a mighty movement is at work, and that movement, or "Japan in Transition," is what our author sees.

The book is full of much practical information as to the language and customs of Japan. Our author would seem to have a brief for this people, and what he says of their so called immorality and peculiar social usages, will bear careful reading. In the main, he takes a sober and proper view, and shows how cruelly the flip-pant and the prejudiced will speak evil of foreigners, that is, of the Japanese, of whom they know very little, and that incorrectly. Our author gives rather a gloomy view of mission matters, drawing attention to abuses among the missionaries, but all these abuses exist in full blast in every Christian country in the world. The actions of soldiers or of missionaries always stand out like a silhouette in the exposed position of the frontier lines. Our author does not give much credit to the Japanese for any real religious longing for Christianity. They regard it as a possibly useful factor in their awakened national life; as a means for bringing them into line with the mightiest nations of the earth, which are at least Christian in name. The book is beautifully illustrated and quite handsome, so much so that one is loath to call attention to several misplaced pages in the early part of the volume.

The Strong Arm. By Robert Barr. New York: Frederick A. Stokes. Price, $1.25.

A collection of short stories on the ancient subjects of love and war, told with Mr. Barr's modern dash and spirit. He takes the reader back to the troublous times when knights and bishops, living in high-towered castles on the Rhine, fought and quarreled among themselves, performed deeds of untold courage, jested roughly, drank deeply, and made love boldly to fair damsels. The tales are interesting from the start, for the most part clever, and often witty. They would serve well to beguile the hours of a warm summer afternoon or a quiet winter evening.

When the Sleeper Wakes. By H. G. Wells. New York and London: Harper & Bros. Price, $1.50.

Many of our readers will remember that very original and taking novel, "The War of the Worlds," by this author. The present volume is on the same lines: weirdness, unusual conditions, imaginary consequences. The story is ushered in by a situation that has been often employed. A man falls into a trance, remains in it for 200 years, and then wakes among entirely changed environments. He wakes in London, but such a different London, such curious mechanical contrivances, such results from forces which in our times are just in their infancy. There is great social discontent when he awakens, and he becomes the leader of the people. Every page in this book develops some novel condition, and Mr. Wells displays a wonderfully vivid imagination. Those in search of novelty will certainly find it in this book, and very well arranged novelty it is.

The Fowler. By Beatrice Harraden. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co. Price, $1.50.

A curious and very interesting study of character. It is not equal to the author's well-known book, "Ships that Pass in the Night," but it is far from being commonplace or dull. If we had not known such things to take place in real life, it would seem utterly impossible that a noble girl like the heroine, Nora Penhurst, could have engaged herself to a wretched, malicious little cad like Theodore Bevan, whom every one instinctively disliked. He is "The Fowler," and several fine women had fallen into his net, and only escaped with much beating of wings. Nora luckily gets out also, and an unexceptionable fellow catches her in his arms, and they are probably happy ever after, though the author wisely refrains from saying that.

Richard Carvel. By Winston Churchill. New York and London: The Macmillan Company.

A fascinating book; the scene for the most part laid in Colonial Maryland, 1765-1782. A book of stirring adventure, of little-known colonial history, of well known London life, and, above all else, a book of pure and old-fashioned love, for the love story is never forgotten in all the vicissitudes of Richard Carvel's eventful life. The book is full of dramatic situations, and is constructed with great art. You can scarce rid yourself of the conviction that it is not a novel you are reading, but a real autobiography, and that a real Carvel once lived and moved among men. It is long since we read so natural, so graphic, so absorbing a story. It is by far Mr. Churchill's best production, and that is saying no little.

St. Mary's Hall Lectures, and Other Papers. By Henry Budd. Philadelphia: Henry T. Coates & Co.

The teachers and students of St. Mary's Hall, Burlington, are fortunate in having such a literary friend as Mr. Budd who shares with them "the occasional relaxations of a professional life." Some of the best work in the literary field has been done in this way. There is a fine flavor in some of these sketches, that indicates a high degree of literary culture as well as wide reading. The author need not fear that he is doing any wrong to the school which is so dear to him, "by connecting its name with this work."

Love, Light, and Life for God's Little Children. A Course of Instruction for Primary Sunday Schools. By Mabel A. Wilson, St. Louis, Mo. Price, $3.

There are many ideas as to the best methods of teaching children Christian truth. Miss Wilson has chosen a plan in this book which contains many excellent characteristics. She begins on the 1st Sunday after Trinity with the Creation, and then carries the children's thoughts up to the birth of Christ. His life, work, death, resurrection, and ascension, and the coming of the Holy Ghost, follow in their proper order. Many would find Miss Wilson's method useful. It is highly spoken of by her rector, Dean Davis, of St. Louis.

The Treasury of the Psalter. An Aid to the Better Understanding of the Psalms in their Use in Public and Private Devotions. Compiled by the Rev. George Putnam Huntington, D.D., and the Rev. Henry Aiken Metcalf, M.A. With a Preface by the Bishop of Central New York. Fourth edition, with corrections and additions. New York: E. and J. B. Young & Co. 1899.

We do not know of any other commentary on the Psalms that possesses so many useful features as this excellent compilation, and we are glad to welcome this new edition of it. The amount of matter, from very many sources, packed into this work, is amazing. The notes are brief and pointed, with numerous references to the rest of the Holy Scriptures, illustrating and expounding the meaning of the text in a most helpful way. An accurate translation of the Hebrew text is given wherever it seems necessary in order to make the sense clear. The other aids, by way of tables, indices, etc., are abundant. We most heartily commend the book, and trust that it may meet with the success which it deserves.

Lettres d'un Innocent. The Letters of Captain Dreyfus to His Wife. Translated by L. G. Moreau. With Portraits. New York: Harper & Bros. 1899. Price, $1.

The affair Dreyfus seems as full of mystery as the Man with the Iron Mask. Behind it all, one is conscious of looming shadows; and one can only conjecture what are the realities which project them. The matter has convulsed France, and the end is not yet. Many deem Dreyfus to be really innocent of treason. With others, his guilt seems a fixed idea. Justice should be done him, though the heavens fall. His letters are sad enough reading, and if one pictures them as coming from a man entirely innocent, they are tragic in the extreme, and sound the depths of a breaking, but brave, heart.

The subject for the Sunday school lessons for the first half of the next Christian Year will be "The Life of our Lord as told by St. Luke." The diocesan committees have settled on a definite and final five years' course of instruction, of which the above forms the initial part. The "Uniform Scheme" has furnished the subject for lessons for more than twenty years, and is so generally used throughout the United States and Canada as to become long since the "standard" in our Sunday schools. The graded quarterlies, prepared by the Rev. George W. Shinn, D.D., have followed the committees' scheme from the start, and will continue to do so along improved lines. The publisher, Mr. Thomas Whittaker, offers to send sample copies free for examination to any one desiring them.

New Music

"I Am the Bread of Life," written for a Communion anthem, by Geo. Alex. A. West, F. R. C. O., will meet with favor from discriminating Church musicians. It would serve admirably as an introit, the theme being first given in solo by tenor voice, and repeated in chorus with a brightly reverent and attractive accompaniment for the organ. The work is clever and beautifully effective. [Octavo, 7 pp., 15c.; from the composer, Germantown, Pa.]

From the house of Novello, Ewer & Co., New York, the following services are on our table this week, each and every number marked at 5c: Te Deum Laudamus, Field in D, Tours in F, Calkin in B flat, Calkin in G; Benedictus, Field in D, Calkin in G; Jubilata Deo, Stanford in B flat, King Hall in B flat; Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis, Stainer in B flat, Kimmins in E flat, Stanford in B flat, Newton in F. "O Clap your hands," anthem by Sir John Stainer, 15 pp., also 5c.

The sub-warden of St. Paul's Cathedral Choir School, Fond du Lac, the Rev. James Martin Raker, has compiled and issued a musical form in short and easy setting for use in Requiems on All Souls' Day, at funerals, and other occasions. It provides for the introit, Kyrie, graduale, tract, sequence, offertory, Sanctus, etc. The sequence and Communio are in the Solesme method; the Kyrie and Sanctus, Sarum; the "In Paradisum," Ratisbon. To such as would appreciate ancient and severe musical types, Mr. Raker's arrangement of a Missa Pro Defunctis will be welcome. [Copies from author, 25c; ten, $2.]

Periodicals

Some time ago, when people were asked how they liked Literature, they would say, generally: "The articles are well written and the criticisms valuable, but the whole thing is dull." Certainly for the last six months no one could say that. If we have one weekly journal of this kind which can be called "bright," Literature beyond question is the one. A genial and delightful humor is evident in every number, and its presence does not detract in the least from the intrinsic value of the contents. The "Reviews" are dull, but so are the books reviewed, and there is plenty of interesting matter in compensation. [Harper & Bros., New York.]

Current History, a quarterly summary of the world's news and progress, opens with an article on Wireless Telegraphy, making the subject plain to every reader; and reviews, among hundreds of other topics, the problems arising out of the war with Spain, the work of the Disarmament Conference, Samoan problem, Alaskan and Venezuelan boundary questions, Dreyfus case, Transvaal crisis, Liquid Air, Color Photography, Trust problem, etc. An especially notable article is that reviewing the situation in China, and the relations and interests of all the great Powers in that quarter of the globe. [Current History Co., 14 Beacon st., Boston, Mass. $1.50 a year.]

The Fortnightly Review for August is given up largely to politics, and South African politics too, as "British and Dutch in South Africa," and "The Struggle for South African Supremacy" attest. The series on "France since 1814," by Baron Pierre de Coubertin, is continued, and is valuable as throwing considerable light upon the course of degeneration upon which that great nation entered a century ago. There are many other excellent articles in this number.

The Nineteenth Century for August contains an article by Dr. St. George Mivart, "Which Church has Continuity?" an attack, of course, upon the Church of England. A rather funny, but at the same time a learned, article, "The Recent Fuss about the Irish Language," is from the pen of Prof. Mahaffy. The article entitled, "Why are Our Brains Deteriorating?" rather upsets us by taking the fact for granted, but perhaps the author is correct. "Life on the Nile South of Fashoda," is a paper full of information. The concluding article of this number is "The Casus Belli in South Africa," and we fear that by next month the magazines will not be able to get out of Africa at all.

The Edinburg Review for July (only recently received) contains as usual a varied assortment of articles, one of the most interesting of which at this time is that on Montalembert whose work a generation ago did so much to strengthen the Ultramontaine party in France, although that was a result that he hardly desired. There is a rather sophomorical and biased article on "The Meaning of Rites," to which a Churchman will not readily give his acquiescence. A delightful paper on the "Odes and Epodes of Horace" gives high praise to one of the more recent of his translators, Sir Stephen E. Devere, Bart., and some quotations which make one desire to own the translation as well as the original. "The Fall of the Roman Empire" is a readable article, but we should like to see the subject handled more thoroughly. Of course "The Life and Writings of Mrs. Oliphant" furnishes a good subject for this as well as for all the other magazines, and one always finds something fresh and interesting written about her. Perhaps the most noteworthy paper is that upon "The Conference and Arbitration," which is distinctly, though gently, optimistic, and is altogether the best-balanced summing up of the work of the Peace Conference that we happen to have seen.

Opinions of the Press

London Times

THE DREYFUS VERDICT.—We do not hesitate to pronounce it the grossest and most appalling prostitution of justice the world has witnessed in modern times. All the outrageous scandals which marked the course of the trial pale into insignificance beside the crowning scandal of the verdict.

Boston Advertiser

No matter what result comes from the verdict rendered at Rennes on Saturday, this much has already happened—that France stands before the civilized world disgraced by the men who prate most loudly of the honor of the nation. The unjust, cruel, and infamous verdict rendered by the second court-martial is destined to be an everlasting stigma upon French honor, French justice, and French manhood. No action in reparation can completely wipe out the memory of a trial so hideously prejudiced and so disgracefully partisan.

New York Tribune

On no principle known to our jurisprudence was that astonishing tribunal entitled to be considered a court of justice. Military courts are, we know, constituted and conducted far differently from civil courts. In some cases they are even more just than the latter. But what presumption of justice was there, or could there be, at Rennes, when the judges were all the subordinates, the creatures, of the prosecutors, sworn by oath to obey them, bound by military tradition and discipline to be subservient to them, and moved by every selfish hope of advancement and fear of punishment to truckle to them?

The Outlook

Recondemned! We rub our eyes to see clearer, but we are still living in modern, not in mediæval, times, as such monstrous injustice might indicate. It seems incredible that this defiance of conscience, reason, and justice could take place in the last part of the last year of that century which we are fond of regarding as the most civilized of all epochs. If there were recondemnation, there was no real conviction, by the court-martial. Instead, the twenty-seven sessions at Rennes amply vindicated the prisoner's assailed honor, and he needed no ridiculous insertion of "extenuating circumstances" in the verdict. Either he was guilty or he was not guilty of such a crime as that of treason. . . . The five men who voted "Guilty" are either imbeciles or perjurers. Instead of convicting Dreyfus, they have convicted themselves. Expediency, not evidence, conquered them. To please the majority of Frenchmen, and to please the army, the judges yielded more even than did Pilate himself; they crucified afresh an innocent victim. As to the effect on France of this fatal yielding to expediency, it will react, not only as an ultimate political blunder, but as definitely committing the country to a policy of moral cowardice.

The Congregationalist

It is France that stands condemned, not Dreyfus. In spite of decisive proof that the accused did not write the famous bordereau, backed by Esterhazy's confession that he did write it, of the utter lack of any proof of treason on the part of Dreyfus, and of the official declarations of the German and Italian governments that Dreyfus had held no relations with them, he has again been condemned. Moreover, the verdict is as absurd as it is arbitrary. If guilty of treason, he should have been put to death. If innocent, he should have been acquitted. In such a case it is hard to see how there can be extenuating circumstances. Dreyfus has been sacrificed once more to the anti-Jewish prejudice which is so strong in France, and, even more, to the imperious, reckless desire of a large part of the French people, and especially of the French army, to allow nothing to interfere with the domination of military rule. Blind to the facts that the evidence, or lack of evidence, in the case has become known everywhere; that, whatever Dreyfus may have been as a man, as a soldier he has been above reproach; and that a nation which countenances such a gross injustice as his renewed conviction, is face to face with disaster, the court-martial stubbornly has insisted upon condemning him, unconscious that its own disgrace ever must be reckoned far more shameful than his.

The Standard (Baptist)

THE SULU ISLANDS.—There will be a great protest from the people of this nation unless the terms on which the Sulu group in the Philippines has been pacified are soon modified. Gen. Bates was sent down there to treat with the Sultan of the Sulus, and succeeded in securing an acknowledgment of the sovereignty of the United States, so that there will be no fighting there. So far, so good. But in the articles of agreement, it is not stated that slavery shall be abolished; on the contrary, there is a special provision to the effect that a slave may purchase his freedom for $20. It is pointed out by the Chicago Record that this is in direct conflict with the thirteenth amendment to the Constitution, which declares against involuntary servitude, not only within the territorial limits of the United States, but in "any place subject to their jurisdiction." The most ingenious twister of the Constitution in the expansionist ranks cannot claim that this phrase does not cover the Sulu Islands, in view of the treaty with Spain and the agreement just made with the Sultan. Moreover, the Sulus are inhabited by a considerable number of Mohammedans who practice polygamy. Shall we allow polygamy for an indefinite time while the Philippines are being pacified and their future destiny decided, or shall it be stopped at once, as being equally bad in a territory beyond sea as in one west of the Rockies?

Belle Dixon's Coat

SEQUEL TO "THE SHELBYVILLE MISSIONARY BOX,"
IN THE LIVING CHURCH OF FEB. 18, 1899

BY H. E. R.

BELLE DIXON, in all the eighteen years of her young life, had never had an all new dress or cloak, as some part of each had invariably been transferred from some former garment. She was the daughter of a missionary priest who had labored for many years in Minnesota, on a stipend that barely gave them the necessities of life, and of a mother who, with the greatest cheerfulness and adaptation, cut over and made over the gifts from friends not much richer than themselves, making the ends meet each year, but with never the surplus that would have given to Belle, and her sister growing to womanhood, even a few of the dainty chiffons so natural and sweet in the life of a young girl. For herself and her husband, Mrs. Dixon planned and sacrificed with a cheerful heart and a merry countenance, but for her daughters, her delicate, sweet girls, there was mingled some little anguish of spirit that their gowns and hats must be of so hopeless a fashion, and so poorly calculated to make even a little of their modest charms.

Belle's nature was of fine temper and poise, and adorned with the sweet Christian grace that gently accepted each limited condition of her life, and rarely rebelled against the necessity that firmly repressed the expression of her graceful individuality. But this year she needed and wanted a cloak with so ardent a desire, that she daily prayed that she might be willing not to have it. Her mother, equally with her, felt her need, and when the printed form, sent by Miss Emory, was filled for the benefit of the church who was to send them the annual box, a cloak of Belle's dimensions was one of the needs presented, and became to her a possibility so hopeful, that the little thin shawl, at present doing duty, seemed to present a braver front against the keen Minnesota winds.

The box had come at last, and in it the cloak, beautiful, warm, and richly lined. It had been bought by a loving mother for an only daughter whom God had taken only a few months before, and who had laid it in the box with loving, reverent hands, and a sobbing prayer that the daughter's memory might be sweet to the young girl who was to wear the coat. It, as well as many of the articles in the box, had been hopelessly stained by the freezing and bursting of a bottle of ink, desired by Mr. Dixon, and carefully packed by the ladies, but which had succumbed to 25 degrees below zero, on a station platform.

And now, after the tiresome process of cleaning and distributing the various things, Belle had wrapped herself in the little shawl, and sat down in the cold quiet of her small room, the stained and disfigured garment upon her lap, to face the disappointment in her own way. She had the happy gift of adjustment, and did not mean to make herself or any one else permanently uncomfortable by an unhappy face or manner; but just now she was alone and could for a brief hour be just what she felt, and picture herself as much as she liked in the stylish garment which would have covered so many deficiencies and kept her so delightfully comfortable. It seemed hard to her that her natural and proper wish could not have been gratified. She was to have, in a few weeks, the opportunity of going with her father on a visit to a clergyman friend in St. Paul, with the promise for him of meeting other clergymen, and for her, of some orchestral concerts, of which having heard none, she had no idea, only that they were music, the like of which she had never dreamed; and now upon her lap lay the end of all her hopes and aspirations in the cold fact that she could not wear that cloak; that she had no other cloak, and that, therefore, she could not go to St. Paul! She had never been out of Minnesota, and seldom away from Windom City. Her education had been given her by her father, and in her long walks on the rolling prairie she had breathed in much of the freshness of their breezes, with the sweetness of their spring flowers. She was a very natural girl, with all of a girl's tastes and instincts for daintiness, but she had happily learned from her early childhood the lesson of obedience to her parents and to her God, and would never have to fight the battles of the undisciplined. All of this training would help her now, and she knew that she would rise from her little rocking chair with unimpaired confidence in God and in her mother, and that she would not go to the concert, and that she would wear the little shawl all winter, and that she would be no worse off than she was before, and that she would be entirely happy; but—she did wish that she could have a cloak! And again she rose, and trying it on, she walked up and down the floor, seeing only the becomingness and the prettiness and the general fitness of it all, without the disfiguring spots. As she unbuttoned it for the great-manyeth time, she saw in the lining, where the cloth is turned to meet it, a hitherto undiscovered pocket, which, in response to her quick fingers, revealed a small, flat slip of paper, saying:

This cloak belonged to my dear daughter Elsie. I would like to hear from the girl who can wear it, and when she tells me how she likes it, she can also tell me, if she will be so kind, something of her life and surroundings. Address,
MRS. WILLIS JAMES,
Shelbyville, N. Y.

Belle's heart beat quick with interest and excitement, and following the dictates of her impulsive and loving spirit, she wrote Mrs. James a charming letter, telling her of their simple and happy home life, of their

GRAND RAPIDS, Mich., 155 Washington Street, March 15th, 1897.

DEAR SIR: In 1881 (16 years ago), I ordered a Patent Elastic Felt Mattress, as an experiment, and the results have been in every way satisfactory. It retains its shape and elasticity in a manner that makes devotees of hair mattresses incredulous. I know of no material that can begin to compare with the felt. My experience with it has made me recommend it to my friends, and they soon join in the chorus of praise. All the claims you make for the material and workmanship seem to me well within the bounds of modesty.

Yours truly,

prairie walks, of the birds and flowers in the spring and summer, of their winter sports, and ended by telling, with great simplicity, how much she had wanted a cloak, and how lovely this must have been:

It just fits me, and I hope to wear it this winter, but some ink froze and broke in the box, and spoiled it, and many of the other things. I am sure that you will be sorry that it was ruined, as we are, but I thought you would be interested; and, any way, I would not have you think me ungrateful. I think that you and all the ladies were very kind, and I am

Very Respectfully Yours,
BELLE DIXON.

This she showed to her mother who, after quick and positive dissent, gave permission for it to go, thinking that it could do no harm, and possibly might indirectly explain why the note of acknowledgment sent on the arrival of the box had been so curt and indefinite. It was posted, and after a very brief interval a letter came from Mrs. James, expressing her deep regret over the disaster to the goods, which must have meant so much disappointment to them, and saying that she had that day packed a trunk with her daughter Elsie's things, hoping that they would give pleasure, and in some way make up for the great loss to all of them. She told Belle that Elsie had died only a few months before, and that she was very glad to have her dear dresses—dear because they had been hers—worn by some sweet girl who would sometimes think of her. She had sent the trunk prepaid, so that their comfort would be no longer delayed than was necessary.

The giving away of Elsie's things, the garments which had been made warm by her warmth, and held in her dear young hands, was a great effort to Mrs. James, but it seemed to her so plain that here was need for them, that she laid her sacrifice, as she had laid her grief, as an offering at her Saviour's feet; but if she could have seen the joy that radiated from the trunk, from the moment it was brought into the house, she would have felt a very sweet reward. The unexpectedness of the gift, the beauty and completeness of it after the galling disappointment of the missionary box, made it a joy too deep for words, and now that Belle knew that the things had belonged to a daughter now dead, they were handled with an added love and reverence. There was the wardrobe of a simply and comfortably dressed young girl in its entirety. There was no other coat, but there was a heavy and handsome golf cape that would answer every purpose, and there were a few dainty wool frocks, that were suitable for the simple life of Windom City, and yet with delightful suggestions of freshness and fashion in their plainness. There were two hats, a quantity of handkerchiefs and ribbons, slippers, oxford ties, and all the belongings so familiar to the city-bred girl, and so unknown to our unsophisticated Belle who assimilated them with delightful readiness, and adapted each with the ease of one born to opportunity. Belle and Mary wrote letters that breathed love and appreciation in every line; in fact, the whole Dixon family seemed to shine in the atmosphere of the girl's happiness, and Mrs. James' heart brimmed over with joy that her darling's memory was to be kept so sweet.

The arrival of the trunk made the city visit quite possible, and on a morning when the snow crisped under the feet and the air sparkled like wine, Belle and her father started away with spirits far above the normal height. The two days in the city were a revelation to Belle. The concerts were an experience that was almost indescribable. She had never dreamed of such music, but she was full of delicate artistic instincts and perceptions, and she climbed lofty heights of unsuspected emotion while the orchestra played with sentient fingers upon her deepest spirit, until the delights of it were so keen as to become suffering. None but a keenly musical temperament can know the mingled joy and pain of a first orchestral concert. It cannot be described, one must be born to its heritage to know the depths and heights of the stirred emotions.

The young girl returned to her simple life in Windom City with a widened horizon, and full of a sweet determination to give to others all that she could of the pleasure that had been given to her. Mrs. James continued to feel an interest in her, and has much pleasure in the letters that pass between them, as well as in sending to her at each opportunity some of things that Elsie would have liked, but who, not having had the advantages of poverty, would never have had in them the keen delight felt by the unspoiled taste of Belle Dixon.

Helen Keller's Examinations

MISS HELEN KELLER, having completed, under the tutorship of Mr. Merton S. Keith, her preparation for college in three years instead of in the four which had been assigned by some of her friends for the purpose, went to Cambridge in June last to take the regular entrance examinations for Radcliffe. She had successfully given the usual subjects at the preliminary examination, two years ago, and these remained for this entrance examination: Geometry, algebra, elementary Greek, advanced Greek, and advanced Latin.

It is quite certain that no person ever took a college examination with so heavy a handicap—we may say with so many kinds of a handicap—as Helen Keller's on this occasion. As all the world knows, she could not see the examination papers nor hear the voice of an examiner. The natural method of communicating the questions to her would have been to make use of the fingers of her old-time "teacher" and interpreter, Miss Sullivan. Miss Sullivan does not know Greek or Latin or the higher mathematics, and while she is able to serve Helen by communicating to her printed Greek and Latin letter by letter, she could not, even if she had been so disposed, have given her the slightest assistance in answering the examination questions. But it was deemed best by all concerned to avoid even the remotest suggestion or possibility of assistance. A gentleman was found—Mr. Vining, of the Perkins Institution, who had never met Helen Keller, and who was quite unknown to her and unable to speak to her, who could take the examination papers as fast as they were presented and write them out in Braille characters, the system of writing in punctured points now much used by the blind. The questions, thus transcribed by him, were put into Helen's hands in the examination room, in the presence of a proctor who could not communicate with her, and she wrote out her answers on the typewriter.

Here, however, came in one of the additional points of Helen's handicap. There are two systems of Braille writing—the English and the American. There are marked differences between them—very much such differences as those between the two principal systems of shorthand writing. Helen Keller had been accustomed to the English system, in which nearly all the books which have been put into Braille are printed. As the arrangement with Mr. Vining was completed but a day or two before, and as it was not known to her that he did not write the English Braille, it was impossible to make any other arrangement. She had to puzzle out the unfamiliar method of writing, much as a writer of the Pitman stenography might use his sense of logic and general intelligence by a tour de force, to enable him to read the Graham shorthand; and this labor was added to the other labor of Helen Keller's examination. To add to her difficulties, her Swiss watch, made for the blind, had been forgotten at home, and there was no one at hand, on either of the days of the examination, to give her the time. She worked in the dark with regard to the time which remained to her as she went along from question to question.

But she passed the examination triumphantly in every study. In advanced Latin she passed "with credit." In advanced Greek, which her tutor regarded as her "star" study, she received a "B," which is a very high mark. Yet here, the time and the Braille difficulty worked most heavily against her. What her marking was in the other studies is not known; it is only known that she passed them.—Boston Transcript.

Oddities in Church

THE cosy squire's pew of the eighteenth century was an elaborate structure, luxuriously furnished, and surmounted by crimson curtains. It often contained, says a writer in Argosy, the only fireplace in the church, and was never complete without a square table. During the reign of George I. a colored footman would enter with a tray of light refreshment just before the sermon. In one of these retreats, Ernest, Duke of Cumberland, being ensconced, was roused from a doze by the exhortation, "Let us pray." "By all means," shouted the Duke; "I have no objection."

The poor were accommodated in narrow pews, very high and stiff in the back. No wonder a timid child remarked that a man in velvet breeches had set her on a pantry shelf and shut the door. Not so little Johnny, who, "on the promise to be dood," was taken to church. He kept very still till the last prayer, by which time he had grown so tired that he got up on the cushion of the seat, and stood with his back to the pulpit. When the lady in the seat behind bowed her head for prayer, Johnny thought she was crying, so he leaned over and said in a too audible whisper, "Poor, dear lady, what ee matter? Does oo tummy ache?"

Very formidable must have been the pew with a lattice around it in which that red-haired vixen, Queen Bess, sat to criticize court preachers. They had to be as particular in their allusions as the chaplains of Louis XIV. "We must all die," exclaimed the preacher. The King frowned fiercely. "All, I mean, save your Majesty," added the subtle courtier.

When a bishop or other cleric made mention of anything which did not please the vain old woman, the lattice was rattled with terrible energy and distinctness, to the discomfort of the unfortunate ecclesiastic. Sometimes she spoke outright, as when the Bishop of St. David's ventured upon statistics which the Queen could not follow: "You keep your arithmetic to yourself; the greatest clerks are seldom the wisest men."

How different was the appreciation of a sermon delivered by an eloquent incumbent in Bosley church, Cheshire. At the conclusion, the kind vicar, leaping through the paper hoop of rubrical restrictions, exclaimed: "My good people, before we sing the hymn I think we cannot do better than heartily thank Mr. Hughes for his most excellent sermon."

In that same church a local landowner, the Earl of Harrington, placed a stained-glass window containing figures of the Virgin and St. John. Some friends of mine, being shown over the building, asked the venerable clerk the subject. "Thein tur," said he, "are meant for Mr. and Mrs. Harrington, but I can't say as they are muich loike."

Speaking of marriages, how amusing is the following incident: The incumbent of a populous parish in the midlands who never failed to have publication of numerous banns, looked for the banns book as usual after the second lesson. Feeling assured of finding it he commenced: "I publish the banns of marriage—" An awkward pause, during which he looked beneath the service books, "but could not see my little friend, because he was not there." "I publish the banns," repeated he, still fumbling, "between—between—" "Between the cushion and the seat, sir," shouted the clerk, looking up and pointing to the place where the book had been mislaid.

DAVID B. HENDERSON, who will probably be the speaker of the next House of Representatives, once fired a rather hot shot, according to The Argonaut, at Holman of Indiana, whose savage opposition to any and all appropriation measures earned him the title of "watch-dog of the Treasury." Some years ago, when an appropriation for Holman's own district was up for consideration, the latter arose, and, departing from his usual custom, made a warm speech in its favor. The instant he sat down, Henderson was on his feet. "Mr. Speaker," he said, "the member's address brings to mind Byron's lines:

"'Tis sweet to hear the honest 'watch-dog's' bark Bay deep-mouthed welcome as we draw near home."

AN EVIDENCE OF PROSPERITY.

It is generally conceded by economists who study the commercial situation of the country, that the great arteries of railway travel are a sure indication of its condition. A depression in commercial lines means abandoned business trips and the cancellation of pleasure travel, while a healthy condition of affairs means business trips and an increase of passengers on pleasure bent.

A good evidence that a business revival has gone broadcast over this country is the "Lake Shore Limited," the star train of the Vanderbilt system, between New York and Chicago, which is daily comfortably filled. With a view to taking the best possible care of its patrons, the New York Central has arranged to increase the equipment of this train by placing an additional standard sleeper on the trains every day. To the regular traveler the appointments and comforts of this train are well known, but if you have never made a trip on it, you owe it to yourself to see and enjoy the advance made in comfort and luxury in modern railway travel. Remember the fare is no higher on this train, except between New York and Chicago, while the accommodations and service place this particular train conspicuously at the head of the list, when compared with other lines.—Albany Journal

The Volney Double First

"Kling, klang! Kling, klang!"
"That is the first bell, Lee."

"All right! I am ready."

Lee Gordon gathered up his book-strap and lunch-box, took down his skates and hurried through the house.

"Good-by, mother." He put his head in at the sitting-room door to nod at his mother.

She turned in her invalid-chair, to smile back at him; but the smile faded at sight of the skates.

"You'll not try the river yet, Lee?" she questioned, anxiously. "I can't think it safe yet. I shall worry."

"There, there! Don't let the worry wrinkles come," he hastily answered. "I'll go by the road."

"Can you get there in time?" Lena was waiting to ask him, as he laid down his skates, soberly.

"I don't know," he replied, with a slow shake of the head.

"The river is safe, though," she argued. "And, if you should be late—"

"I know it, sis; but I promised mother. It won't do to let her worry, and I don't want her to think she can't trust me. She would worry always. Here I go."

He set off on a run up the river road which led to the academy, up on the bluff above town.

"Hello, Lee! You had better move faster!"

It was Ray Harter who shouted at him, as he glided up-stream on swift steel runners.

Lee set his teeth together. He knew what it all meant to him. Had he not been contending with Ray as a competitor for the entire year—all to gain the Volney prize? Dr. Volney did not believe much in prizes. He held that they were too apt to lead to unhealthy rivalry. But he had offered the "Volney First," as it was called, to the one who might have the best record.

After the examinations of to-day the matter would be practically settled, and to be late would break his record for punctuality.

"Kling, klang! Kling, klang!" went the bell again, just as he turned off the main street.

"Five minutes yet, but I must make a spurt." And he set into a dead run.

There was a sound of bells, and he turned his head to look. A big dog turned the corner.

"Prof. Sage!" he exclaimed. "Plato always gets there first. I can ride." He stopped midway the block, as Plato dashed on ahead. Then there was a sudden cry.

"O Bennie Fagin!"

A child, just stepping out a gate near by, met Plato squarely on the sidewalk, and both child and a bucket of milk were borne to the ground together. Plato dashed on, as his master's sleigh rounded the corner at a swift pace.

"Oh, my knee, my milk," shrieked Bennie, in one breath.

Lee hesitated. He had but to call out, and Prof. Sage would let him ride; but there was Bennie. If the child was not hurt, the milk was spilled; and Bennie was likely to be hurt if his drunken father felt in the humor.

The sleigh was upon him. But there was blood upon Bennie's hand.

He stopped and pulled out his handkerchief.

"Only a scratch, Bennie. Be a man. Come back and get some more milk. Mrs. Bates, fill up the bucket again. I'll pay for it," he said, as he hurried Bennie in at the gate to the woman who stood watching it all. It took a few minutes to find the necessary two cents, for which Mrs. Bates sternly waited. He fished them up from the depths of his pocket at last; and, with a pat on Bennie's head, he ran out the gate, carrying a vision of a cherubic smile on the child's countenance.

"It meant so much for Bennie," he reasoned, adding, dolefully, as the bell tolled its last three strokes, "and it means a good deal for me."

The bell ceased, but he hurried on. If he could have a minute's time to look over Caesar's doings before his examination, he might help himself out. There was one question he wanted to ask Miss Page before the class came in.

He dashed up the steps at last, and flung open the door.

"I beg your pardon, Dr. Volney!" Lee stopped abruptly. This time it was he who had just escaped a collision, and with the dignified doctor.

"Loitering, sir?" Dr. Volney sharply asked in surprise. He had no patience with any one who did not possess the cardinal virtue of punctuality, and Lee felt his heart fall heavily.

"No, sir," he faltered. "I could not come by the river, as I'd intended—and—and I got stopped on the way."

He could not tell why he stopped, he thought, as he felt the doctor's stern gaze fixed on him. The doctor must think what he would; and, at the curt, "Pass on," he went down the hall, wondering how far he had fallen in that person's estimation.

The boys were pouring out from chapel as he reached Miss Page's door, and his hand was on the knob as his name reached his ears. It was Ray who hurried to him.

"I had to go down after crayons, and I got a pointer on geometry questions," he whispered, excitedly. "And I'm not the fellow to take advantage of it, when we've been running the race together so long, neck to

Why? because Mellin's Food children have a healthy appearance, are full of life and vigor, have good color in their cheeks, firm, solid flesh and a vital force that carries them safely through the trials of childhood.

Mellin's Food

I have a baby girl 9 months old who has been fed on Mellin's Food since she was 2 days old. She has never known a day's illness. She sleeps all night and is good-natured during the day. She is so strong and healthy that I often say she is a good advertisement for Mellin's Food. I change milk quite often without the least trouble. I know a number of children here who were raised on Mellin's Food and they are so much healthier compared with other children that it is surprising to note the difference. Mrs. E. J. neck about. I heard Prof. Sage talking in that absurd way he has—to himself; and he has problems 8, 10, and 16 down for us. You know the book, and there's plenty of time to take a look at them after Cæsar. Mum's the word."

Lee passed into Miss Page's room to receive her "Good-morning!" at the threshold, her hands on the transom-rod screw. When his work was well under way, she came down the aisle, and scanned his paper. He grew hot as she placed her finger on what he had written: "All Gaul is divided into three problems," and looked at him sharply. He worked on but fitfully then, until she again passed up the aisle and stood at his side with the warning: "Only fifteen minutes left. Have you reached your conclusion?"

He was not at all sure he understood her question; but he replied with energy, as he gathered up his papers and dashed at his work, "One conclusion, at least, has been reached." But she smiled back at him as she went on up to the platform. He did not know that she noted his sigh as he handed in his papers at the appointed time, that she saw Ray's whisper and his determined shake of the head at the proffered geometry, nor that she stood to command a full view of Prof. Sage's room as Lee marched in with the class, and, turning from the groups discussing the coming examination, took his seat, to sit with folded arms till the trial began.

But Lee went home with a heavy heart that night. Problems 8, 10, and 16 had so eluded his memory that he had made a sad muddle of them, he knew. He met his mother's smile with an answering one, as she told him she knew he had not gone up the river; and he answered Lena's sympathetic words, as she learned of his tardiness, with: "Never mind! The examination would pull me down any way." Only he could not help but say, however, "But you know, if I could have won the prize, I'd've stood a better chance of getting the place I want in the spring."

Both knew that it was Lee's cherished plan to find a place in Judge French's office, and thus have a chance to study law as he might have time. The place was open, but this seemed to be the end of it; for it was well known that the discerning judge who was a member of the board of visitors, and Dr. Volney's close friend as well, was watching closely the outcome of the prize work. He would not even tell Lena of Ray's offer. Nor would he boast of what he had done by telling her why he was late, he said to himself. He would try to think no more about it. But Lena did not forget it.

That evening the academy teachers were assembled to decide matters pertaining to the prize work.

"If it had not been for problems 8, 10, and 16," Prof. Sage announced, "Lee and Ray would have stood together; but, while Ray's paper is perfect, Lee did nothing much with them."

"Ray knew you had set those problems," said Miss Page, quietly. "You talked too loudly when alone, and he heard you. I heard him tell Lee that they were to be put down."

"And Lee did not look them up?" Prof. Sage shuffled his papers for a fresh examination, as he put the question.

"I am sure he did not. I watched him from that moment until he began the work with you. I do know he was tempted, though." And she rapidly told what she had observed.

Studies are not to be counted in as everything," broke in Dr. Volney. "But I was pained this morning to see Lee late."

A knock broke the silence that followed.

"Lena Gordon wishes to speak with Dr. Volney a moment," said Miss Page from her seat near the door.

"It is about Lee," said Lena, hurriedly, as the doctor appeared in the hall. Her voice trembled at his stern look, but she went on bravely. "Mother's sick, and she didn't want him to skate up the river, as he does usually; and he wouldn't worry her doing it."

"The ice is safe. But why didn't he start in time?" The doctor spoke curtly.

"He—has so much to do," she stammered. "And—and we thought he did have time."

What a mess she was making of it, she suddenly thought, as she nervously twisted her gloves.

"Did he send you here to tell me this?" he demanded, sharply, scanning her face.

"Oh, no, sir; he does not know it. I slipped away. He said it would make no difference—his examination—but I knew it did—I wanted you to know—and he wouldn't break his word to mother—if the ice was safe—he said she wouldn't trust him again—and Lee wanted—Judge French—the law office—" She broke down at this point of her incoherent talk, and sobbed, to the utter consternation of the doctor. Then a voice broke in. Mrs. Fagan was at her nightly round of cleaning floors, and she had heard it all.

"An', shure, it's all thrue an more. Didn't he kape Bennie from a batein' whin the bhasite Plato spilt the milk knockin' ov him clean over? An' didn't the bye himself pay the cints fer more milk; an' what wid that an' the shtoppin' to fix the darlint's fingers that was after hurtin' him, shure an' the blessid saints theselves'd be late I don' know, an' that's the thruth ov it!"

"I—I think I understand the whole situation," the doctor slowly replied, as he waved Mrs. Fagin to her work and dismissed Lena with a kindly pat on the shoulder.

"They know why he was late, anyway, now," said Lena, proudly, to herself, as she hurried home. Lee had not suffered, after all, by her blundering way of speaking for him, she thought, as she remembered Mrs. Fagin's testimony; but she must not tell Lee she knew that, for he evidently had not wished her to know of his good deeds. But she did not know how much Dr. Volney and his associates did know. Neither did Lee, who presented himself the following afternoon to hear, with the class, the results of the term's work read out to the assembled audience, and to witness the presentation of the Volney prize.

In a few brief words Dr. Volney referred to the prize and the fact, that, though he was averse to offering prizes as a rule, he had consented this time to award a volume of Shakespeare to the boy who had the best record. Then he continued, as he held up the richly bound copy:

"The boy who preferred to be late rather than worry his invalid mother; who preferred to lose his record for punctuality rather than break his word and cause her to lose faith in it; who preferred to fall out of the race rather than let a little child suffer; who gave up rank in class rather than keep it by questionable methods, that boy I hold to be the one who, by taking a course that builds up a noble character, has the best record, and deserves the 'Volney First.' Lee Gordon, it is yours."

Then there was another stir as Lee, dazed, was pushed forward to stand by the doctor's side and wait while Judge French spoke from his standing place in the visitor's row.

"Dr. Volney," said he, "I have a word more to say. The boy who did all that is the boy I have been looking for. If Lee Gordon will come to my office to-morrow, he'll receive the position I know he covets; and we'll call it altogether the 'Volney Double First.'"

"And I knew you ought to have it all the time," said Lena, loyally, that night.

"To build up a good character does pay," said Lee, soberly.—Christian Register.

Arthur Stoltz, Chorister

EARLY in the winter, a messenger brought word to the rector that a communicant of the Church was near the border of the life immortal, and desired to see him. He went and found her alone in her home. She was in the grasp of the dread disease, consumption. In the course of the conversation she mentioned with great concern, but with a sweet confidence, her only child, a boy of eight years. She said she was anxious that he should be brought up in the Church of which she had long been a communicant; a wish in which her husband who was a Roman Catholic, for her sake concurred. The little fellow was not a stranger to us, having attracted our attention in the Sunday school by his sweet, pure, thoughtful face.

A few weeks passed. It was Christmas Day. Amongst the congregation we noticed this child, alone, following the service as best he could, doing as the others did, devotion in every attitude, apparently absorbed in the spirit of worship. Perhaps fifty had received the Sacrament, and we were administering to others at the altar rail, when, hidden between two, we noticed this boy, kneeling and holding his hand reverently outstretched for the Bread of Heaven. We gave him the Sacrament by a momentary inspiration that made it impossible to pass him by. A few days later we visited his home, and the mother said he had told her upon his return, "Mamma, you know you couldn't go, and so I went in your place."

Meantime Arthur was admitted to the preparatory class for the choir, and something in the earnestness of the desire he expressed to be in the choir, led the choir master to give him special attention, and his progress was furthered by a musical intuition inherited from both parents. So he became a chorister, the youngest ever admitted in St. Andrew's. He was a manly little fellow, looking always on the serious side of his duties, attracting the affectionate regard of his boy associates.

In February, God took Arthur's mother to Himself, but no change was involved thereby in our little chorister's relations with the choir. Choir-practices and services found him present until Ascensiontide. Then came the news of his illness with diphtheria, and on the eve of Whitsunday the tidings that he had gone to join,—shall we doubt it?—the celestial choir of the undefiled who stand before God's throne and praise Him day and night.

On Whitsunday the body of the little communicant of Christmas was committed, with the Church's benediction, to the kindly earth. Beside the casket there stood a beautiful star of fairest, brightest, and sweetest flowers—the choir's offering. We thought it a fitting emblem of the height to which such a sweet spirit must pass into the glory of God when released from the mortal and the corruptible. Such was the passing of Arthur Stoltz, chorister.—St. Andrew's Messenger (Chicago).

ACRE once meant a field of any size. The Germans still use the word in this sense. God's acre, meaning a cemetery, is an instance of the old meaning. Libel once had no reference to anything offensive, but simply meant a small book or pamphlet. But pamphlet wars, which often were nothing but printed billingsgate, changed its meaning. Jeremy Taylor refers to the "beautiful imps that sang hosannas in the temple." Imp once meant a little child, and not a child of the devil, as it does now. Preface was formerly the word of welcome to a meal. Voyages were formerly made over land as well as water. Meat was applied to any kind of food, while to starve originally meant to work one's self to death—a significant footnote to the history of peasant risings in the early days.

HARD TO PLEASE

Regarding the Morning Cup

Oh, how hard it was to part with coffee, but the continued trouble with constipation and belching was such that I finally brought myself to leave it off.

Then the question was, what should we use for the morning drink? Tea was worse for us than coffee; chocolate and cocoa we soon tired of; milk was not liked very well, and hot water we could not endure.

About two years ago we struck upon Postum Food Coffee, and have never been without it since. We have seven children. Our baby, now eighteen months old, would not take milk, so we tried Postum, and found she liked it, and it agreed with her perfectly. She is to-day, and has been, one of the healthiest babies in the State. I use about two-thirds Postum and one-third milk, and a teaspoon of sugar, and put it into her bottle. If you could have seen her eyes sparkle, and hear her say "good" to-day when I gave it to her, you would believe me that she likes it.

If I was matron of an infants' home, every child would be raised on Postum. Many of my friends say: "You are looking so well!" I reply: "I am well; I drink Postum Food Coffee. I have no more trouble with constipation, and know that I owe my good health to God and Postum Food Coffee."

I am writing this letter because I want to tell you how much good the Postum has done us, but if you knew how I shrink from publicity, you would not publish this letter—at least not over my name.—Milford Ohio.

Finance and Commerce

WALL street has again been the centre of interest the past week. Prices that have been made by two and three per cent. money could not be maintained with money at six to ten per cent., and the result has been a sharp decline. The extremity of the stringency is probably temporary. The reduction of loans and the influx from the country on account of the high interest rates, will no doubt soon relieve the tension. Apart from this the business situation presents no shadow. The public interest in trusts resulted in Convention held in this city last week. It is altogether likely that the regulation of trusts will be a factor in the next campaign, but the real trouble from them is more apt to be deferred until it takes the form of unfriendly legislation, either State or national or both.

Clearances for the last week by banks were about 25 per cent. greater than last year. Exports for August were 20 millions greater than ever before for the same month. Railways everywhere are crowded to their utmost capacity to handle their business. There is no cessation in the demand for iron, and it seems impossible for the mills to increase the reserve stocks. Prices are firm. In fabrics both cotton and woolen, demand is good, and prices firm. Raw cotton shows more steadiness. The government crop report was very bullish, so much so that it was discredited, and for a time seemed to help toward an anti-climax.

Grain and provisions continue without much change, although the increasing stocks of wheat seem to weight the market towards lower prices slowly. The possibility of a South African war operates to neutralize the bearishness of the situation, although unless other European complications grow out of it, it is difficult to see how a war between England and the Boers, should increase the price of wheat to an appreciable extent.

Exports During August

THE foreign commerce of the United States in the month of August, 1899, is the largest in the history of that month. The exports are nearly twenty-five per cent. higher than those of August of the phenomenal year 1898, and thirty-three per cent. higher than the average of August in the years 1894, 1895, and 1896, while for the eight months of the calendar year ending with August they are the highest in our history. The total exports for the eight months ending with August, 1899, were $792,595,332, against $778,632,207 in the phenomenal year 1898, $641,979,330 in 1897, and $602,298,473 in the great export year of 1892

The importations for August also show a marked increase, being $66,718,737, against $49,677,349 in August last year, and $39,844,605 in August of 1897. While the details of the August importations are not at hand, the details of the July imports, which have recently been completed, indicate that the growth in importation is largely in the class of materials used by manufacturers and in tropical foodstuffs. In the seven months ending with July, the importation of raw fibers for use in manufacturing amounted to $13,260,530, against $10,382,321 in the corresponding months of 1898; rubber importations in the seven months of 1899 are $21,190,323, against $15,554,792 in the corresponding months of 1898; imports of raw silk for use in manufacturing amounted in the seven months of 1899 to $20,381,197, against $15,227,303 in the corresponding months of 1898; imports of hides and skins in the seven months ending with July, 1899, were $27,591,356, against $24,583,092 in the corresponding months of 1898. In tropical foodstuffs the increase is also apparent. The imports of fruits and nuts in the seven months of 1899 were $10,988,623, against $7,749,278 in the corresponding months of 1898; cocoa, $3,548,146 in the seven months ending with July, 1899, against $2,316,970 in 1898; while of sugar the imports of the seven months of 1899 were $67,777,398, against $48,973,680 in the corresponding months of last year. The growth in exports is in both agricultural products and manufactures. The August exportation of breadstuffs was $25,580,352, against $19,909,329 in August of 1898; of provisions, the exportation of August, 1899, was $15,584,755, against $13,489,098 in August, 1898. Mineral oils also show an increase, being for August, 1899, $6,565,009, against $5,010,507 in August, 1898. Taking the four great articles which are named in the advance statement of exports of domestic products, breadstuffs, provisions, mineral oils and cotton, the total for the month of August was $53,925,488, against $44,758,510 in August of last year, $48,305,066 in August, 1897, and $36,631,485 in August, 1896.

Valuable Statistics

"AMERICAN commerce. The trade of South America, Central America, Mexico, and the West Indies, and the Share of the United States and other Leading Nations Therein, 1821-'98," is the title of a monograph just issued by the Treasury Bureau of Statistics. It discusses, as indicated by the title, the commerce of South and Central America and the West Indies, the trade methods, the popularity or otherwise of manufactures and products of, the the United States, the transportation and lack of transportation between the United States and the South, the steamship routes from port to port and the distances, the railways now built which must serve as part of a through line connecting the continents and countries, the length of railway necessary to be constructed and its prospective route, and the share which the United States now has and which other nations have in the commerce of each of the countries of Central and South America.

Cleaning Lace

BASTE the lace on a stout piece of lawn. Take short stitches, sewing along the inner edge of the pattern first, then stretch the fabric until the lace lays perfectly smooth. Catch down the main figures and, lastly, the border. If there are picots in the body of the work or upon the border, put a stitch in each one, drawing the picot out its full length. This careful basting is absolutely essential.

Now for the removing of soilure. Take soap (recipe which I append) and warm water; put them in a fruit jar, together with the point lace or small Battenburg pieces, and shake until clean. Rinse in the same manner, in clear water, to which has been added a few drops of gum arabic water, and a little coffee, if a creamy tint is desired. Do not wring, but squeeze the articles in a towel. Pieces that are too large for the jar, should soak in the suds about fifteen minutes. Work gently between the hands, squeezing the dirt out. In the rinsing water, instead of the gum arabic, pour a very little thin cornstarch—not laundry starch—if you would have success. Stretch the cloth upon which the lace is basted over some upholstered surface. Pin the cloth taut, taking care that every portion of the pattern is in correct shape. Let the article become perfectly dry before removing. Iron the linen centre, but press the lace, on the wrong side, over several thicknesses of flannel. Press lightly, very lightly, remembering not to dampen the lace.

By following these directions, filmy laces—even white chiffon veils—may be frequently washed, retain their beauty and, what is still better, do not show that they have been cleaned.

To make the soap: Take one ounce of soap bark, put into one pint of water, boil twenty minutes, and strain. Into this liquid put one ounce of borax and one half-bar of white soap, shaven fine; heat until dissolved, when it is ready for use. As this amount is enough for a goodly number of pieces, and it will keep indefinitely, pour it in a jar. It will have the tinge of the bark, but this will not affect the most delicate fabric.—Good Housekeeping

CLEAN carved ivory with a paste of dampened saw-dust, and a few drops of lemon juice. Lay it on thickly, allow it to dry, and then remove with a nail brush. Alabaster figures are cleaned with the following mixture: One ounce of borax and a quart of boiling water. When cool, wash the figures gently, and dry with a silk handkerchief. If badly stained, try a paste of quicklime and water, and let it remain on for a day; then wash off in soap and water. Olive oil occasionally applied with a soft woolen cloth, keeps burl cabinets and ormolu ornaments bright; first, clean off all dust. Bronzes may be plunged into boiling water until warm, then cleaned with soap-suds and dried with old linen cloths. If this is ineffectual, try bees-wax and turpentine, rubbed on and off with clean, soft cloths; sweet oil, and polishing with a chamois, is another remedy.

Notes of the World's Progress

AN UNCONFIRMED DISPATCH from Manila states that the release of Lieutenant Gilmore and sixteen prisoners, all of the crew of the Yorktown, who were captured April 12th last, has been offered by Aguinaldo, the only privilege asked in exchange being the admission of several Filipinos through the lines for the purpose of conferring with General Otis. If the dispatch be true, it would indicate a desire on the part of the Filipinos to put an end to hostilities; but whether the report be true or false, it is the policy of conciliation, and not extermination, which will the more quickly restore peace. The failure of the commission appointed by the President to achieve satisfactory results, does not altogether imply that negotiations would be fruitless. There is sufficient intelligence among the Filipinos to recognize the fact that if the power of the United States be brought to bear, there can be but one outcome to the struggle. Tact might possibly accomplish that which powder has up to date been unable to do. There is a moral to be drawn from the history of the surrender of Santiago.

INABILITY TO DISCERN FACT FROM fiction, and reality from opinion, in the greater part of telegraphic matter emanating from the Philippines, renders the formation of intelligent opinion and sentiment difficult. Sunday papers outside the Associated Press published what purports to be an interview with General Otis on the situation, in which the latter gives utterance to expressions which, if true, would betray an utter lack of diplomacy. General Otis is reported to have replied in answer to requests from Southern and Northern provinces for protection: "What's the matter with independence? Go back and enjoy it a while longer." If the reported interview with General Otis is merely a piece of journalistic enterprise to be contradicted in the course of a few days, the writer should be subjected to a form of punishment yet to be devised.

DISSATISFACTION AMONG STREET railway employees is likely to break out next in Cincinnati. The men have lately been organized, and have resolved to demand twenty cents an hour for all time over ten hours, and the privilege of sitting when outside the crowded districts. Officials of the company have expressed their willingness to treat with a committee of employees as individuals, but refuse to deal with them as representing a labor organization. This seems to be a case where public sentiment would be clearly with the employees of the road, particularly as opinion would lean strongly to the belief that any self-respecting, dividend-paying corporation could pay employees twenty cents an hour for overtime work; but a strike which would demoralize transportation, and cause the public no end of inconvenience and annoyance, is not the best method of inducing sympathy and securing justice.

VENEZUELA HAS A REVOLUTION which has grown to alarming proportions. Nobody seems to know clearly what it is all about, but the insurgent leader, General Castro, has several thousand men to his support and others coming, and has twice defeated the government forces under President Andrade. Ships of war are being sent to the scene to look after foreign interests. While turbulent scenes are being enacted in Venezuela, the arbitration tribunal called to settle the boundary dispute with England, and thus avert war, is holding protracted sessions in Paris. No event in the history of modern oratory can compare with that of the eminent men gathered in Paris. One gentleman delivered an address which took up the better part of twelve days. Any nation which can furnish material for such bursts is indeed in trouble. When the Paris tribunal completes its task it may be necessary to subdue the Venezuelans before the verdict can be formally delivered.

ANNOUNCEMENT THAT A SECOND wheel pit is to be constructed on the bank of the Niagara river is equivalent to a definite statement that the experimental stage of a great undertaking is passed, and that what were once vague dreams are to become reality. Simultaneously comes the report that test borings are to be made on the Canadian side, preparatory to awarding the contract for a plant capable of developing tremendous power. When the first wheel pit on the American side was constructed, it seemed doubtful if there would be a return on the millions of dollars involved. Problems arose, the like of which had never confronted electrical engineers. On the word of experts, capitalists proceeded, and the result is a perfectly equipped electrical plant, generating 50,000 horse power. The new pit to be constructed will be of equal capacity. In view of the success of the undertaking, color is added to the prediction that the foot of Lake Erie will one day be the greatest manufacturing center in the world. Cheap power is there in unlimited quantities.

THE CONFERENCE ON TRUSTS called by Governor Syles, of Texas, held its sessions in St. Louis last week, and adjourned after framing a set of resolutions embodying the sentiments of the gentlemen present, as to the best methods of controlling or suppressing trusts and monopolies. The conference did not accomplish as much as was expected, neither will its deliberations carry as much weight as would have been the case had it not been stamped into a partisan affair. The question being one which affects people regardless of political belief or party affiliation, should have been handled without reference to the present administration. The attendance was not what was expected, being hardly large enough to be considered representative of the country at large. The resolutions urge uniformity in State legislation and federal as well, restricting the acts of corporations, and rigidly prohibiting the formation of companies with water rather than financial ballast.

IN ADDITION TO STRAINED RELATIONS in South Africa, England is threatened with complications in the Sudan. The campaign so ably and successfully directed by Lord Kitchener settled the question so far as possession of the territory is concerned, but as the Khalifa escaped after the defeat of his army, he was by no means suppressed. It is now reported that the Khalifa has been actively at work, and gathered together an army of followers that threatens serious interference with English plans. The dubious attitude of the Abyssinians leads to the belief that King Menelek is in sympathy with the Khalifa, if not actually lending him secret support. Had it not been for the Anglo-Egyptian conquest, Menelek would have extended his frontier to the Nile, and he bitterly resented being warned off, and still claims an outlet on that great river. The situation would be grave should the Khalifa and Menelek make common cause against England.

CONSIDERABLE INTEREST HAS BEEN aroused by a decision of the Spanish cabinet to stop payment of interest on that portion of the national indebtedness known as the Cuban debt, represented by bonds amounting to $435,000,000. It is supposed in some quarters that this action will shortly be followed by a demand on the United States government by holders of the bonds for this amount. This government is in no sense obligated to assume the debt or any portion of it, but should Spain repudiate the indebtedness, complications may follow. The attitude of the American Peace Commissioners when the treaty was formulated, was that Spain contracted the debt while prosecuting war against the Cubans and the United States and that inasmuch as Cuba was not consulted in the making of the debt, it could not be held under the new order of things. The Spanish plea was that the debt was a lien on Cuba, and that the United States assumed liability through interference in depriving the bond holders of their security.

WITHOUT ANY BLARE OF TRUMPETS there was opened recently in Philadelphia, a National Export Exposition, which will have a far-reaching effect on the commerce of the entire country. The purpose of the exposition is to show foreigners what the United States can produce in the field of industry, and to spread a general knowledge of our agricultural resources and mechanical industries, and thus to increase our exports. The exhibits are of a most varied character, fitly representing our producing capacity. Philadelphia is wide-awake to the importance of enhancing both foreign and domestic trade. It is but a few years since the mammoth commercial museum was opened, an enterprise decidedly unique in character.

The News of the Church

Consecration of a Bishop for Indiana

St. Matthew's Day was a perfect autumnal day, and was ushered in, in St. Paul's church, Evansville, by a celebration of the Holy Communion at seven o'clock, the Rev. R. H. Peters, celebrant. A second Celebration was at eight, the Rev. F. O. Granniss, celebrant. Morning Prayer followed at 9:30. The consecration service began at 11 o'clock, when the long line of choristers and clergy entered the west door of the beautiful church, singing "The Son of God goes forth to war." The Bishop of Chicago was the celebrant, the Bishop of Michigan City, Epistoler, and the Bishop of Michigan, Gospeller; the Bishop of Springfield preaching the sermon, taking as his text, II. Timothy iv: 6-8, and as his theme, "The ideal bishop." The pictures were boldly drawn of St. Paul, and in contrast, the bishops of the time of the great heresies, and of the Mediæval Age; and of the need, if not the want, of bishops to-day to stand against the inroads attempted by German critics, and to repel the temptations to a loose interpretation of God's law, that mammon's good will may be retained by the Church.

The Rev. Dr. Joseph M. Francis, Bishop-elect, was presented by the Bishop of Milwaukee and the Bishop of Lexington, to the consecrators, the Bishops of Chicago, Michigan, and Michigan City; the attending presbyters being the Rev. Messrs. H. M. Denslow and H. D. Robinson. The Rev. Willis D. Eagle read the certificate of election, the Rev. G. A. Carstensen, the assents of the Standing Committees; Bishop Burton, the assents of the Bishops, and Bishop Nicholson, the commission of the Bishops appointed to consecrate. The litany was said by Bishop White. The whole service was most impressive, the music being appropriate and correctly rendered by the choir, under the direction of the Rev. Charles Kues; and the arrangements under the direction of the Rev. R. H. Peters, master of ceremonies, working most smoothly. The closing processional was Hymn 176.

In the evening a reception was given at the handsome home of Chas. Viele, where the members of the congregation and the citizens of Evansville generally, had an opportunity to express their congratulations and regrets, and it was very evident that Dr. Francis and Mrs. Francis had, in their less than two years' residence, won the hearts of all who, while they rejoiced that their friend had been advanced to a larger field, could not but regret that his duties were to take him from residence among them.

The diocese of Indiana as at present constituted, is a field that demands much hard work for the Church's upbuilding, but its people stand ready to give their new Bishop loyal support.

The Board of Missions

The Board of Managers met at the Church Missions House, on Tuesday, Sept. 19th. The Bishop of New Hampshire was called to the chair. There were present seven bishops, 11 presbyters, and seven laymen.

Formal announcement having been made of the death of Mr. Cornelius Vanderbilt, a member of the Board from its institution, and of the Rt. Rev. Dr. Pierce, Bishop of Arkansas, an ex-officio member, the chairman offered prayer for those in affliction, and other suitable devotions. A special committee of three was ordered to prepare a minute on behalf of the Board, expressive of its sense of bereavement in the death of Mr. Vanderbilt. The chair named as such committee: The Bishop of New York, the Rev. Dr. David H. Greer, and Mr. J. Pierpont Morgan.

Communications were received from 81 bishops in the United States having missionary work under their jurisdiction, with regard to the disbursement of their respective appropriations, etc., and favorable action was taken in necessary cases.

Photographs were submitted from the Hon. D. E. McGinley, United States Consul in Athens, of the monument erected by order of the Board to the memory of the late Miss Marion Muir. The old school building at Athens, pending its sale, has been rented to the government.

Report from the Treasurer

A letter was read to the Board from the treasurer, written before sailing for England, in which, after explaining his absence, he said:

While there are many matters of an encouraging nature, especially the increase in the Lenten offerings from the Sunday schools, there are yet many parishes which have not responded, and we have not succeeded in arousing that interest in the missionary work of the Church which the times demand. We must also bear in mind that our needs are greater, and, for myself, I do not believe that the furnishing of statistics and information, such as have been called for recently through the columns of some of our Church papers, will accomplish the desired result; but there is great need of awakening the conscience of the Church. One member of the Board has asked the assistant treasurer for some figures regarding the way in which the contributions are made up, and he has prepared the following table of the contributions for the year 1897-8, which resulted as follows:

Twenty-three individual gifts of $500 or over, not credited to parishes or Woman's Auxiliary	$61,000
Seventy-six parishes giving $500 or over contributed (in addition to $29,000 from their Woman's Auxiliary and Sunday schools included in figures below)	83,000
From the Woman's Auxiliary we received	56,000
From the Junior Auxiliary we received	4,000
From the Sunday schools during the year (less $4,000 Junior Auxiliary)	86,000
Income from trust funds	41,000
From 3,650 parishes and missions, through Church collections, and from individuals contributing less than $500 each	71,000
	$402,000

The figures needed for the analysis this year are of course not yet available.

The Executive Committee and the Associate Secretary, as the Board are no doubt aware, have issued most earnest appeals to the Church, and during the entire summer, I have given the most careful attention to the matter of getting through the year without debt, have written a great many personal letters, and also issued over my own signature a letter calling attention to the circulars above referred to.

The treasurer's reports for the year were submitted by the assistant treasurer, and, after necessary action, referred back to him for completion. It can be said at this moment that all the liabilities of the society, to Sept. 1st, have been provided for.

The Work in Puerto Rico

The Rev. George B. Pratt, missionary at San Juan, Puerto Rico, was invited to come to the United States for the purpose of affording those in authority, and the Church at large, more particular information with regard to the work in that island and its present needs. It is hoped that he will be in attendance upon the Missionary Council. From information received from him, it appears that during the recent hurricane the missionary's house was not damaged. We are otherwise informed that the church building at Ponce must be torn down and rebuilt. Mr. Pratt says: "My own work here is in the shadow of an immense cloud of distress which has come upon us, yet I can say we are all holding our own well, and I have thousands of things to be thankful for."

The Need of Workers in Alaska

Letters from the Bishop of Alaska showed that he is still very anxious for the appointment of a missionary at Ketchikan, which is becoming an important centre of a very promising section. Hundreds of men are prospecting in the neighborhood. He needs a young, manly unmarried man. The Rev. Henry J. Gurr who has been in charge since Jan. 1st, has been appointed to the mission at Juneau, with the care of the work at Douglas Island. At the former place the Bishop has secured a lot, and wishes to build a church as soon as he is able to advance $500 for the purpose. He would like a young man sent out to work at Douglas City under Mr. Gurr. He has appointed the Rev. L. J. H. Wooden to Fort Yukon, which place Mr. Wooden expected to reach before the winter should set in. The Bishop says it would have been disastrous to have left it vacant. Mr. A. N. Kierulff, a candidate for Orders, from California, under the Bishop will work at Skagway. The Bishop also needs a priest to join Mr. Selden (a layman) at Fort Adams, and writes: "Dr. Watt has begun to build a chapel at Circle City, to cost $1,000. He needs $500 outside help." The Rev. J. W. Chapman's annual report of the work at Anvik was published in the September number of The Spirit of Missions.

United Offering Appointments

Under the United Offering of the Woman's Auxiliary of 1898, upon request of the bishop, concerned, the following appointments were made: Miss Josy Saxton, teacher at Morganton, N. C.; Miss Virginia Patrick and Mrs. Israel Harding (in the room of Sister Ella and Miss Duffy, declined) at Waynesville, N. C.—all in the missionary district of Asheville; Miss Nannie Smith, as teacher and churchworker in Iredell Co., N. C. Miss Augusta H. Murphy, as an additional teacher at Pyramid Lake Reservation, Wadsworth, Nev. (to take effect in October); Miss Sarah J. Elliott, as teacher and missionary worker at Moab, Utah; and Miss Edmonds on Prince of Wales Island, Alaska, where the Indians themselves are very anxious to have her, having begged her to come to them. Provision was also made for the training of Miss Fanny Lees, of Salt Lake (previously a missionary worker under this fund), and the continued residence of Miss Charlotte M. Mason, appointed to China, in the Church Training and Deaconess' House, Philadelphia.

Progress in Our China Mission

Letters were submitted from all the foreign bishops and many of their missionaries. The Bishop of Shanghai has bought from the Church Missionary Society of England their church and lot in the native city. It was a remarkable opportunity, as it was situated in a neighborhood where we were paying rent, and others were anxious for it. He conveys the information that the St. John's chapel congregation (Chinese) at the college, will hereafter pay their own incidental expenses and half the salary of the native deacon. The chapel is to be extended, as the congregation is very crowded. They have nearly funds enough on hand, raised partly by the congregation, to pay the cost of lengthening the nave. In connection with this, the Bishop remarks: "Do not forget that we do all we can for self-support, although it may seem slow at times in coming." The Rev. S. Harrington Littell who went out in 1893 at his own charges, for an experimental year in the mission, and Edmund Lee Woodward, M.D., of Richmond, Va., were appointed, by the concurrent action of Bishop Graves and the Board. In submitting his reports for the year, the Bishop thinks that there is a good deal of matter for encouragement in the figures that they were able to send. The Rev. F. L. H. Pott reports the formal opening of Science Hall. Information was submitted that the missionaries for China and Japan, who were present at the farewell service at the Church Missions House on Sept. 1st, would be detained in San Francisco until Sept. 29th, because the government has chartered the steamer "Rio de Janeiro," upon which their passages had been engaged.

The Work in Africa

Bishop Ferguson writes that the church edifice at Cape Mount, Africa, is progressing finely, but unless his appeal for additional funds meets with favorable response, they will have to stop far short of completion, which would be a matter of deep regret. He gives information that at the time of the election for President and the members of the Legislature, the majority of the civilized Greboes declining to vote at the dictation of their tribe, were denounced by their chiefs, and attempt was made to punish them accordingly. The chiefs sacked and broke up Hoffman station, our native Christian village, near Cape Palmas, with a single exception destroying the houses of all those who had voted contrary to their wishes. About the same time they destroyed the Eliza F. Drury station, which was established with money received from the estate of the lady of that name, formerly resident in Massachusetts. The business agent at Cape Palmas fears that we shall not be able to resume work at that point. The Bishop estimates the loss at the former place at $2,334. On July 2d the Bishop consecrated Christ church, Crozier-ville, and at the same service advanced the Rev. N. H. B. Cassell to the priesthood. It is notable that a number of the mission congregations in Africa (nearly all of them) have contributed to the Sunday school Lenten Offering. Miss Lulu Higgins, at Cape Mount, has been ill for some time, but was better when she wrote in July. She would not speak of her indisposition earlier, because she was afraid that she would be ordered home, while she was satisfied that her duty was to stay at the station until she was relieved by some one competent to take charge. The following preamble and resolution is published to the Church by direct order of the Board of Managers:

WHEREAS, On several occasions sums of money, raised by special effort of individuals, have been misdirected and wasted in the African field; therefore

Resolved: That the Board of Managers advises that all moneys contributed for work in this mission field be sent to the treasurer of the Board directly, to be reported and accounted for through the Bishop of the missionary district, and that the Bishop of Cape Palmas be directed to communicate this action to his missionaries.

The Work in Mexico

The Rev. Mr. Forrester communicated an interesting report upon the work among the English-speaking people in the Republic of Mexico; he having been deputized by the Board to look over the ground. This will be published at length in the forthcoming number of The Spirit of Missions. The Board appropriated $500 and some traveling expenses to start the work, upon the assurance of Mr. Forrester that when "once well started, it will take care of itself." His annual report of the work among Mexicans was also submitted, as were, too, reports from the Woman's Auxiliary, the Commission on Work among the Colored People, the Society for Promoting Christianity amongst the Jews, and a number of the missionary bishops. The Rev. Dr. Powers, secretary of the American Church Missionary Society, read to the Board his report.

Canada

The Bishop was expected home on his return from his visit to England about Sept. 24th. A very good paper on "How far is fiction helpful to the work of the clergyman?" was read at the morning session of the meeting of the rural deanery of South Simcoe, in St. John's church, South Simcoe, the first week in September. Prof. Cody read a paper on "Monasticism." There is a scheme to establish a voluntary school under Church management in Toronto. It will be held in the schoolhouse of the church of the Messiah. While the secular instruction will be the same as that given in the public schools, and submit to the same inspection, the first half hour of each day will be devoted to religious teaching. The Rev. John Gillespie and Mr. Lawrence Baldwin support the plan. The Bishop of Niagara made the opening prayer at the opening of the Industrial Exhibition in Toronto in the beginning of September. There was a very large number of members present on the afternoon of the first Sunday in September, in the cathedral, at the annual Church parade of the Ancient Order of Workmen. Christ church, Whitfield, is being painted and renovated within and without, and it is expected, will be opened on Oct. 1st, the 25th anniversary of the first opening of the building. St. George's church, Gore's Landing, celebrated the 51st anniversary of its consecration in August. There were very large congregations at both services.

Diocese of Huron

Bishop Baldwin held a Confirmation service in Trinity church, Burford, Sept. 10th. The offering was a generous one at the thanksgiving services at Trinity church, Blyth. The rector of St. John the Evangelist, London, the Rev. W. T. Hill, has returned from England much improved in health.

Diocese of Montreal

Many congratulations were presented to Bishop Bond on the occasion of his 85th birthday, Sept. 10th. In spite of his age, he is able to perform all his episcopal duties without assistance. The Bishop held an ordination at Grenville early in September. The Rev. H. S. Eastman, who has been assisting at Christ church cathedral, Montreal, has accepted a charge in Arizona, U. S. It is expected that the coming session of the Montreal Theological Diocesan College will be a very successful one, so many names have been entered as students for admission. It is expected that the church of St. James the Apostle will be ready for use by the beginning of October. The additions and improvements are very extensive. The quarterly meeting of the executive committee of the diocese was held in the Synod Hall, Sept. 14th, the Bishop in the chair. He held a Confirmation at Outremont on the 17th. It was the first service of the kind held in the new church.

Chicago

Wm. Edward McLaren, D.D., D.C.L., Bishop

The Bishop has returned from his Eastern trip, having been absent about six weeks.

Waterman Hall, Sycamore, which closed its tenth year so successfully last June, has reopened auspiciously, with an attendance that fairly taxes its capacity.

On Monday of last week, the Rev. T. A. Snively laid in Rosehill cemetery the cornerstone of a mortuary chapel which Mrs. Horatio N. May is erecting there in memory of her late husband, to be used for funeral services.

Evidence of the return to the serious work of the Church for the autumn and ensuing seasons, are discernible in the large attendance of the clergy at the Monday clerics, the complete announcements of all parochial societies, and the filling up of the Sunday congregations. While many changes in the personnel of the latter are as usual observable, the vacancies by death are unusually few. Among the most notable is that of Mr. Joseph B. Keeler, of St. Andrew's, of whom his rector, the Rev. W. C. DeWitt, has written very feelingly in his parish paper, and to whose "devotion to the interests of the Church during 11 years' service on its vestry," his fellow-vestrymen have borne high testimony by appreciative resolutions at a recent meeting.

Presentation to Bishop-elect Williams

As we go to press the fall quarterly meeting of the Northeast Deanery is being held in Trinity church, Highland Park. As this is the last convocation before the consecration on the 18th prox. at Omaha, the gathering of clergy is large; the opportunity being used to present from his brethren an episcopal ring to Bishop-elect A. L. Williams.

Parish Lectures and Entertainments

St. Andrew's, like other city churches, has arranged a promising course of instructive lectures. An elaborate series—a course of 14 on the Thursdays of each week—is arranged by the Rev. C. Scadding, of Emmanuel, La Grange. A charge of $2.50 admits to the whole. But, in addition to the course, there are these appointments, to which a general invitation is given: Sept. 21, parish reception; Oct. 19, promenade concert; Nov. 2, reception to some prominent authors; Dec. 16, annual fair and sale; Dec. 21, Sunday school entertainment.

St. Peter's, Lake View

The $20,000 debt will be reduced to $18,000 on Oct. 1st, and the rate of interest lowered from six to five per cent. The Woman's Guild of this thriving parish is interesting itself strongly in the support of the mission at Walhalla, N. Dak. (to which the offering at the Bishop's consecration—some $400 or $500—was devoted), and also in supplying the furnishings for the altar in Bishop Elsall's church.

Accident to Rev. T. D. Philipps

Shortly after noon of last Saturday, the Rev. T. D. Philipps met with a serious accident in a simple way. Crowded upon the Dearborn street bridge, just as it was closing, he had his left foot jammed between the bridge and the parapet. The laceration of the foot is so severe that it may be a week or more ere he can be able to walk, or even rise from his couch. His escape from more serious injury was providential.

New York

Henry Codman Potter, D.D., LL.D., Bishop

The Rev. Canon Paddock, of the pro-cathedral, is suffering from typhoid fever.

The free open-air services at Van Cortlandt Park have been discontinued for the season.

The 15th annual conference of Church Workers among Colored People, will be held from Oct. 31 to 6th, in St. Philip's church, New York city.

The chapel of the Holy Name, at the institutions of the Brothers of Nazareth, Rahberg, Cragmoor, has just been blessed by Bishop Seymour, of Springfield.

Pleasure for Poor Children

Bishop and Mrs. Satterlee, of Washington, have greatly added to the pleasure of the poor city children sent to the Catskill Mountains, by the New York City Mission Society, by entertaining them at their cottage at Twilight Park.

New Rector for St. John's Church, Yonkers

The parish has chosen as rector, in succession to the late Rev. Dr. Alexander B. Carver, the Rev. Andrew F. Underhill, now rector of the church of the Good Shepherd, Brooklyn, and he has accepted.

Work in Cuba

The American Church Missionary Society, auxiliary of the Board of Missions, has raised the money needed to furnish the new orphanage at Matanzas, Cuba, and is now striving to secure $50,000 for a similar institution at Havana.

Grace Church Fresh-Air Work

Has closed for the season at its new Grace House-in-the-Fields at New Canaan, Conn. Under the guidance of one of the curates, the Rev. Mr. Galway, seven house parties of about 75 each, including children and parents, have visited the home during the summer, and the average number in the house has been 106 persons. The Knights of Temperance and the Young Crusaders went into camp near the house, under military drill, patrolling camp and house with sentinels having a countersign. The cost of the work has been about $3,000. From the house as a centre, numerous excursions have been made into the surrounding country.

St. Bartholomew's Chinese Club

Has now a paying membership of 200 Chinamen. There is also a Sunday school, which, notwithstanding its great difficulty in securing teachers, has 118 Chinese pupils. The leader of the club, Mr. Guy Main, gave attention to nearly 1,000 cases last season in which Chinamen needed protection by law from cruel or unjust treatment. The physical aid and sympathy extended wins them towards Christianity. The guild is recognized as the headquarters for Chinese work. It had an income for the year of about $1,500, a considerable portion of which was contributed by the Chinamen themselves. The balance was provided through the Rev. Dr. David H. Greer, of St. Bartholomew's church.

Church of the Holy Communion

The Sunday services of this church, situated at the corner of 20th st. and 6th av., the Rev. Henry Mottet, rector, will be resumed the first Sunday in October. During the summer, very extensive improvements were made in connection with the church interior, augmenting greatly its beauty, and adding in marked manner to its usefulness. A full, carefully selected choir will again serve at the 11 A. M., and the 4 and 8 P. M. services, under the direction of Mr. Charles Whitney Coombs who has been spending the summer in the study of Church music in some of the principal cathedrals of England. The Rev. J. H. McIlvaine, D.D., has just been appointed the preacher at the Sunday afternoon services. The services will be as follows: Holy Communion at 7:30 A. M. and noon; children's service and sermon at 9:30 A. M.; the principal service and sermon at 11 A. M.; afternoon service at 4 o'clock; evening service at 8 o'clock.

Contingent Charitable Bequests

Are contained in the will of Mrs. Anne M. Henry, widow of the late Rev. John B. Henry, which directs that in the event of her children not surviving her, her estate of $1,000 is to be divided between the Episcopal Hospital and the Home for Incurables (unsectarian).

Trinity Church, Southwark

Which has been closed during the past summer for extensive improvements and renovation, was re-opened on Sunday, 24th inst., with an early celebration of the Holy Eucharist, followed at a later hour by Matins and a second Celebration, the rector, the Rev. Horace A. Fuller, officiating and preaching both in the forenoon and at Evensong.

St. Luke and the Epiphany, Philadelphia

The Rev. Dr. T. A. Tidball, rector, has returned from his summer vacation, and officiated on Sunday, 24th inst. During his absence abroad, the church has undergone a thorough transformation, and the interior has been made especially attractive. The Rev. Leverett Bradley, associate rector, who has been absent for two years, is expected home during the present week.

Church Services for Old Soldiers

Ever since the Rev. Samuel P. Kelly has been rector of St. Barnabas' church, Haddington, he has held regular Church services twice each month, and addressed the inmates of the Home for Aged Veterans, G. A. R., and their wives, that building being within the parish bounds. On Sunday afternoon, 24th inst., Major Moses Veale, rector's warden of St. Philip's church, West Philadelphia, made the address.

Choir Changes

At Holy Trinity memorial chapel, Philadelphia, the Rev. Robert A. Mayo, minister-in-charge, a double quartette choir has been introduced, with Miss Shain as first soprano. Mr. Selden Miller is choirmaster and organist. During the past summer the organ has been greatly improved,—virtually rebuilt. It stands in a recess on the gospel side of the chancel, with the console at some distance from the instrument, so that the organist faces the congregation and choir; the action is therefore reversed.

Rector for Church of the Holy Apostles

Early this month a unanimous call was extended by the vestry of this church to the Rev. Nathaniel S. Thomas, rector of St. Matthew's church, Wheeling, Va., to become rector of this important parish, which also includes the memorial chapel of the Holy Communion. It is understood that the call has been accepted, and the vestry will formally elect the Rev. Mr. Thomas rector, and also a rector's assistant to succeed the Rev. J. S. Bunting, resigned. The Rev. Mr. Thomas is a son of the late Bishop Thomas, second Bishop of Kansas.

New Parish House at Gwynedd

The Sunday school of the church of the Messiah, Gwynedd, the Rev. John H. Converse, rector, held its first session on the 17th inst., in the new parish house, which had been formally dedicated on Thursday evening, 14th inst. The building is of frame, 30x50 ft., and was designed by Messrs. Cope & Stewardson, of Philadelphia. On the main floor is a platform, 14 ft. in depth, with convenient closets and sliding doors to shut off the audience room; it occupies one end of the interior, and there are within it staircases leading to the basement, and also to the exterior. The basement is cemented and the walls plastered; provision is made therein for various parish agencies, including all the requisites for a kitchen, a sewing machine, a shuffle board for recreation, and a heater. Building operations were hurried so as to have the parish house opened before the Philadelphia residents of the vicinity returned to town for the winter. Many gifts were made, including stained glass windows, hanging lamps, and the several articles in the basement. The total cost was $2,000, and is all paid for, except about $350. The Rev. Mr. Converse is much elated over this recent addition to his parish, as the building is a real necessity for carrying on the work.

Milwaukee

Isaac Lea Nicholson, D.D., Bishop

The Bishop has given his official consent to the consecration of the Rev. Joseph Marshall Francis, D.D., to the see of Indiana, and will assist in the function.

The church of the Holy Innocents, Racine, is now completed, as to its recent improvements, amounting almost to a rebuilding. The cost, in all, was about $1,200.

The Fifty-third Annual Council

Held its sessions at All Saints' cathedral, Milwaukee, Sept. 19th and 20th. The proceedings opened with a High Celebration in the cathedral church at 10 o'clock, the Bishop officiating. The sermon, an able discourse on "The Church's mission," was preached by the Ven. Jeremiah J. Wilkins, D.D., Archdeacon of La Crosse. The council was called to order in the cathedral guild hall by the Bishop, president ex-officio. The Rev. Dr. C. B. B. Wright was unanimously re-elected secretary of the diocese, and on his nomination, the Rev. G. F. Burroughs, assistant secretary. The following re-appointments were made and confirmed: (1) To be archdeacons, the Ven. E. Pardon Wright, D.D., of Milwaukee; the Ven. Percy C. Webber, of Madison, and the Ven. J. J. Wilkins, D.D., of La Crosse. (2) To be deans of the convocations, The Rev. C. L. Mallory, of Milwaukee; the Rev. March Chase of Madison, and the Rev. Evan J. Evans.

In the evening a missionary meeting was held, at which the Bishop delivered his annual address. In the course of it he reported no loss by death in the clerical ranks during the past year, but many and serious losses amongst the prominent laity of the diocese. He had confirmed 685 at 81 separate visitations, and made 34 other visitations, total 115; preached 260 sermons, not including the usual Confirmation addresses; baptized, 4; marriages, 2; funerals, 4; celebrations of Holy Eucharist, 85; attended 7 meetings of trustees, board of missions, etc., also 15 commencement and kindred meetings; assisted at the consecration of two bishops; ordained 12 to the diaconate, and 17 to the priesthood; received 17 clergy into the diocese, and transferred 16 to other jurisdictions. Candidates for Priests' Orders, 19; postulants, 18; lay-readers under license, 15; clergy in the diocese,—bishop, 1, priests, 84, deacons, 10, officiating under license, 6, total 101. Laid four corner-stones and blessed and opened four new churches: consecrated two churches—the cathedral, and St. John's, Portage, blessed one rectory building, dedicated four guild halls. Following the Bishop's address, missionary speeches were made by the Rev. Messrs. Braun, Mallett, and Dennis, and Mr. K. D. Peterson. A collection was taken up for diocesan missions, amounting to over $23.

On the second day Mr. Charles P. Jones, of Milwaukee, was unanimously re-elected treasurer of the council and of the Board of Missions.

Board of Missions: The Rev. Messrs. L. P. Holmes, McVettie, Burroughs and Barnes; Messrs. C. P. Jones, Horstman, Ruger, Spensley, Holway, Kennedy, Warden, and Kelsey.

Standing Committee: The Rev. Dr. Webb, president; the Ven. Archdeacon Wright, secretary; the Rev. Mr. Stidell, and the Rev. Dr. Piper; Messrs. L. H. Morehouse, and E. P. Brockway, Judge Putney, and Mr. J. L. Bostwick.

A new canon "Of Burial Grounds" was adopted, and a canon "Of the Annual Parish Meeting," was so amended as to allow of adult females voting at parish meetings, but forbidding them the right of holding office. The Ven. Archdeacon Wilkins and Mr. L. H. Morehouse were elected delegates to the Missionary Council of St. Louis.

Forty-eight clerics of the diocese and 39 lay deputies were present during the sessions of the council. Luncheon was served each day in the cathedral guild hall by the ladies of the cathedral and other city parishes. The entire proceedings from first to last were most harmonious, and all agreed that this council had been an eminent success and a great help and stimulus.

Long Island

Abram N. Littlejohn, D.D., LL.D., Bishop
St. James' Church, Elmhurst

The Rev. E. M. McGuffey, rector. This parish has recently received from one of the congregation the gift of a memorial church porch, of Gothic design, built to conform to the architecture of the church. It is a commodious, costly, and beautiful structure, and complete in all its appointments. On its west wall is fastened a bronze tablet, bearing this inscription:

This porch is erected to commemorate the labors of the Rev. William Urquhart who laid the foundations of St. James' church, A.D., 1704, thereby opening the door of the Church of God to this community

The porch was recently consecrated by the Bishop. It stands as the first memorial of any kind to the Rev. Mr. Urquhart who reached this country in July, 1704, and began officiating in Jamaica, Newtown, and Flushing. The folio Prayer Book presented for use in Jamaica and elsewhere, by Lord Cornbury in 1703, is now among the treasured records of St. James' church. A few years ago, the old name of Newtown was changed to Elmhurst, and St. James' church now finds itself at the geographic centre of Greater New York.

St. Thomas' Chapel, Rifton Glen

On Sept. 9th, the corner-stone was laid in the presence of a large assembly. The Rifton band headed the procession, which started from the residence of Mr. Ritter. A platform had been erected for the choir and clergy, on which an organ was placed. The service commenced with the singing of the well-known hymn, "The Church's One Foundation." The Archdeacon of Orange, the Ven. W. E. Thomas, D.D., read the appropriate prayers and, assisted by Mr. N. Hogeboom, the mason in charge of the work, laid the corner-stone in due form. He then led the assembly in the recitation of the Nicene Creed. The corner-stone bears the date 1899, surmounted by a cross. On returning to the platform, addresses were made by the Rev. Henry Barker, rector of All Saints', Rosendale, and in charge of the mission at Rifton; the Archdeacon, and the Rev. Messrs. W. J. Agnew, L. R. Dickinson, and O. Applegate. The greatest interest was taken in the proceedings by all present. Many of the Church residents of the village are encouraged, and it is hoped the mission will gather round it a large congregation and an active body of workers. The nave or main part of the building is 22 feet by 42 feet, with a chancel 8 feet by 12 feet at the rear. The interior presents a more Gothic feeling than the exterior, heightened by the open trusses and timbered ceiling, the pointed chancel arch and windows, and the simple screens around the robing-rooms. The trusses and all roof work are of spruce; the floor, trimmings, screens, and pulpit, of North Carolina pine. The windows are glazed with amber colored glass, and the walls are tinted a light buff. Located on each side of and separated from the choir by low screens or partitions, are two robing-rooms, one of which might be utilized for an organ alcove. In the choir proper, which is raised one step above the nave floor, space is secured for the singers and visiting clergy, and a small pulpit is provided at one side. Back of the choir is the chancel, raised slightly from the nave floor level.

Frank Rosebrook Millsbaugh, D.D., Bishop

Consecration of Church

On Wednesday, Sept. 20th, St. Mark's church, Medicine Lodge, was consecrated by the Bishop, the Rt. Rev. F. R. Millsbaugh, D.D. The sermon was preached by the Rt. Rev. Francis Key Brooke, Bishop of Oklahoma. Several of the clergy of the diocese were present. The service, which was led by a large and well-trained choir, was beautiful and impressive. The church is of Gothic design, centrally located on the main street of the town, and cost $1,700, without the furniture. The furnishing is complete in every detail, representing memorials and gifts of interested friends, and the whole reflects great credit upon the faithful and hard-working rector, the Rev. L. L. Swan, by whose untiring efforts the church has been erected and paid for. In the evening, the Bishop confirmed a class which had been carefully prepared for the reception of that holy rite. The services of the day were well attended by the townspeople who are learning to appreciate the Church's worship and the efforts of this devoted missionary in their behalf.

Central Pennsylvania

Ethelbert Talbot, D.D., LL.D., Bishop

Archdeaconry of Reading

The fall meeting was held Sept. 18 and 19th, at St. Luke's church, Lebanon, the Rev. J. Mitchell Page, rector. At Evening Prayer, on the 18th, the Rev. Robert H. Kline was the preacher, and made an able plea for personal effort on the part of the clergy, especially in preparation of candidates for Confirmation. On the 19th, at 7:30, the Holy Eucharist was celebrated by the Rev. Dr. W. R. Scott. A breakfast, under the auspices of St. Agnes' Guild, at the rectory, immediately followed, after which a short business meeting was held, and at 11:10 the clergy in attendance, and many of the laity from Lebanon and vicinity, took the train for Jonestown and proceeded to the Church Home for Children. After very pleasing exercises by the children, and addresses by the Rev. Messrs. Shero, Abel, and Page, Archdeacon Buxton, and Dr. Sterling, a lunch was served to all present in the large dining-room, following which the guests were privileged to inspect every part of the building. This admirable home for destitute children is under the superintendency of the Rev. Alfred W. Abel, a conscientious, self-denying, and beloved priest. On the return to Lebanon, the archdeaconry again assembled, and listened to an excellent paper by the Rev. J. M. Koehler, on "The condition of the deaf and dumb before and after education," read by the Rev. B. F. Thompson; a very profitable and instructive discussion ensued. The archdeaconry adjourned to meet on the second Monday in January, 1900, at Grace church, Allentown. At 8 o'clock, after Evening Prayer, missionary addresses of a helpful nature were made as follows: "The spirit of faith," by the Rev. B. F. Thompson; "The spirit of zeal," by the Rev. Dr. W. R. Scott; "The spirit of sacrifice," by the Rev. Dr. G. H. Sterling. The archdeaconry meeting was an inspiring one in every way.

Alabama

Richard Hooker Wilmer, D.D., LL.D., Bishop
H. Melville Jackson, D.D., Bishop-coadjutor

St. John's church, Montgomery, has contributed $127 to "Bishop Wilmer's Evangelistic Fund," $100 being the gift of one man.

The Rev. Mr. Fitzsimmons having resigned the charge of Carist church, Avondale, the Bishop has assigned the Rev. Dr. Beard in his place.

A movement is on foot to remove Grace church, Mount Meigs, to Scotia, a town one mile from its present location, and directly on the Georgia and Alabama railway.

St. Peter's church, Talladega, will shortly paint and repair their church property, furnish the vestry room, and beautify the church grounds.

The newly appointed evangelist for North Alabama, the Rev. Richard W. Hogue, will, by direction of Bishop Wilmer, conduct Missions at the following points: Bridgeport, Trinity, and Scottsboro.

Church Work Revived

The Church people of La Fayette (one of the earliest settled places in Alabama, and numbering 1,500 souls) are now under the charge of the Rev. R. C. Jeter, and will be given one service a month, the Presbyterian church having been rented for this purpose. There are seven communicants in this place, and the only visitation ever made to La Fayette was in 1846, by Bishop Cobbs. A congregation was formed in 1833 by the Rev. Thos. A. Cook, which died a few years after.

Missouri

Daniel Sylvester Tuttle, D.D., Bishop

Corner Stone of St. James', St. Louis

On the 14th Sunday after Trinity, the corner stone was laid by the Bishop, assisted in the services by the rector and the Rev. Messrs. A. T. Sharpe, B. F. Newton, and G. A. Ottmann. The rector read the list of articles placed in the corner-stone, among which were a letter from Mr. Simmons who was absent at Oronowoc, but represented by Wallace Simmons; a photograph of Lullie Simmons, for whom the church is a memorial, an historical sketch of the church, etc. The Bishop closed the ceremonial function with a brief address appropriate to the occasion. The church is to be a substantial building of stone, 80 ft. by 50 in dimensions, with a seating capacity of 400. Beneath the audience room are a Sunday school and lecture room, 50 by 50, and apartments for guilds and the social side of church work. The estimated cost of the building alone is $25,000. The situation is directly opposite the old church at the corner of Goode and Cote Brillante aves. The lot was purchased for $3,500, of which $1,800 were the proceeds of the sale of the former property, the remainder furnished by the congregation. The new St. James is built by Mr. E. C. Simmons as a memorial of his daughter, Lulie Simmons, who departed this life eight years ago. Mr. Simmons has taken a warm interest in the parish ever since it was taken in charge by the Rev. Mr. Duckworth, at which time it was supposed to be expiring, and its steady and substantial growth, with assured prospects for the future, is an encouraging contribution to the strength and influence of the Church in St. Louis. An exceptional feature of the growth of St. James', is that it is not due to the moving in of Church families, but the waking up of indifferent ones, and the gathering in of non-church goers.

The Missionary Council

The various committees are making active preparations for giving the council a cordial welcome in St. Louis. The opening services will be at the cathedral, Tuesday, Oct. 24th, with the Holy Communion administered by the Bishop of the diocese, and the sermon by Bishop Dudley, of Kentucky. On the previous Sunday, Oct. 22nd, special missionary sermons will be delivered in all the city churches by bishops and eminent clergymen, and in the afternoon there will be a grand rally of the Sunday school children, probably in the exposition building, with missionary addresses by Bishop Hare, Rev. Dr. H. L. Duhring, of Philadelphia, the Rev. J. Addison Ingle, of the China mission, and others. It is to be hoped that every Sunday school will be out in full force, officers, teachers, and scholars. In the evening of the same day will be at the cathedral a general missionary mass meeting, with addresses by Bishop Gailor, of Tennessee, Rev. Dr. Swentzel, of Brooklyn, and Rev. Dr. Faude, of Minneapolis.

The working sessions will be held at St. Peter's church. We give the topics of discussion in their order, with the names of speakers and writers as far as known at present: "Our new responsibilities." 1. The Philippines; writer, Bishop Doane, of Albany; speaker, Sergeant John H. Peyton. 2. Puerto Rico; Rev. Geo. B. Pratt, our pioneer missionary, will write a paper, to be read by the associate secretary, himself being unable to be present, and Chaplain Brown, U. S. A., formerly of the Rough Riders, has accepted an invitation to speak, subject to the permission of the military authorities. 3. Cuba; Bishop Whitaker who is Bishop in-charge, and the Rev. Dr. W. Dudley Powers, will read papers.

"How to increase the interest in the Lenten Offering"; writer, Rev. Dr. H. L. Duhring; speaker, to be announced. "The missionary power of the Prayer Book"; writer, the Rev. Dr. Samuel Hart; speaker, the Rev. Dr. Geo. Hodges. "In the event of the Partition of China, what will be the effect upon Christian Missions?" writer, the Rev. A. C. Bunn, M. D., formerly medical missionary at Wuchang; speaker, the Rev. J. Addison Ingle, missionary at Hankow.

Western Michigan

George De Normandie Gillespie, D.D., Bishop
Presentation to Rev. Dr. Van Antwerp

The members of Grace church, Holland, gave a reception to their rector and his wife at the residence of Mr. and Mrs. M. J. Kinch, welcoming them home from their trip abroad. After a pleasant evening devoted to music and conversation Mr. A. J. Ward presented to the Rev. Dr. and Mrs. Van Antwerp in behalf of the congregation, a beautiful Dresden china clock. The Doctor responded in his usual happy vein, giving several good anecdotes, as well as a description of the great clock at Berne.

Missionary Work of the Rev. W. P. Law

The Rev. Woodford P. Law, general missionary, has completed five years of active service, and expects to aid in arranging for a new system of missionary work in the diocese. He reports in that time 700 services, 210 celebrations of the Holy Communion, and 25 burials at various places from South Haven to Petoskey. He has presented 71 candidates for Confirmation, and traveled, in many short trips, about 40,000 miles.

Minnesota

Henry B. Whipple, D.D., LL.D., Bishop
M. N. Gilbert, D.D., LL.D., Bishop-coadjutor

Mrs. Gilbert, wife of Bishop Gilbert, has so far recovered from her continued illness as to be able to take an occasional drive.

The Rev. Dr. Wright, rector of St. Paul's church, has arrived in Switzerland, where he and his family have taken up their residence.

At Linden Hills, a flourishing suburb of Minneapolis, a neat little chapel has been erected, named St. John's, with Mr. Hector Baxter in charge. A flourishing Sunday school has been gathered in, and Church services are maintained.

The Rev. C. E. Haupt, formerly rector of the Messiah, entered upon the duties of general diocesan missionary Sept. 1st. He will continue to act as warden of the Deaconess Home, of which he was the founder. His knowledge of the diocese as secretary of the Board of Missions, specially adapts him for this work.

New Church at Rushford

The parishioners at Rushford are erecting a $5,000 stone church; the money has already been subscribed. The church will bear the name of Emmanuel. Bishop Gilbert laid the cornerstone June 17th; a banquet followed after the ceremonies.

New Edifice for St. Paul's, Minneapolis

After two years' agitation the vestry of St. Paul's church have decided to sell their present property, at Hennepin ave. and 12th st., and erect a handsome large edifice on Lowery Hill. The architect is already at work upon the plans; the exact location will be selected shortly. Work upon the new church will be started before the end of the year.

Brotherhood of St. Andrew

Held their midsummer rally at St. James' church, St. Paul. The Rev. George H. Mueller conducted a Quiet Hour. After supper, served by the ladies of the parish, shortened form of Evensong was rendered in the church. J. F. Langdon read a well prepared article on St. Andrew's Brotherhood, past, present, and future. The Rev. G. M. P. Pridham presented a timely paper on "Resolute Christianity." Both papers elicited a lively discussion, in which all participated. The gathering proved very helpful and stimulating.

Harvest Festival

In St. Peter's church, St. Paul, was held on the 16th Sunday after Trinity, commencing with a celebration of the Holy Eucharist, the rector, the Rev. George H. Mueller, celebrant and preacher. The choir rendered in good taste, festival music at both services. The decorations were exceedingly beautiful. On the Monday evening following, according to the usual custom, the annual parish supper was held in the guild room; about 75 parishioners attended it. The rector acting as toastmaster, made a few brief but appropriate remarks. The Rev. Edwin Johnston and the Rev. Stuart B. Purves, former rectors, gave a history of the parish during their respective incumbencies, and profitable advice for the future. Members of the vestry and the treasurer also responded in a humorous vein. The social gathering was very enjoyable.

Washington

Henry Yates Satterlee, D.D., LL.D., Bishop
Brotherhood of St. Andrew

The bi-monthly meeting of the local council was held in the Epiphany Sunday school room, on Monday evening, Sept. 18th. In the absence of the president, Mr. Frank M. Evans, Col. Cecil Clay, of St. Andrew's chapter, presided. There were 60 men present, and much interest was shown in the proceedings. Brief addresses were made by the Rev. Alfred Harding and Mr. W. B. Dent, of St. Paul's chapter, and by Messrs. Salter, of St. John's; Bryan, of Emmanuel chapter, Anacostia; and Currie, of Ascension. An informal discussion respecting the approaching convention, followed. The Rev. J. R. Bicknell, of Florida, gave an interesting account of work in connection with St. Catharine's mission, Pensacola, and spoke of the help rendered by a former Washington Brotherhood man who had there organized a chapter and done noble work for the Church.

Memorial to Rev. Dr. Crummell

The vestry of St. Luke's church have received contributions of $5,000 towards a fund for the "Crummell memorial rectory," which it is proposed to build in memory of the founder of the church, the late Rev. Alexander Crummell, D.D.

Maine

Henry Adams Neely, D.D., Bishop

Meeting of the Board of Missions

The usual fall meeting of the Board of Missions was held in St. Mary's church, N. E. Harbor, Sept. 12th and 13th. On Tuesday evening the first meeting was held in St. Mary's church, at 8 o'clock, when, after prayers, addresses were delivered by the Rev. Henry Bedinger, of Salem, Mass., on "The preservation of apostolic truth and order," and by the Rev. W. C. Stewart, on "The restoration of unity." These were both very able presentations of the Church's teaching. Canon Leffingwell presided, in the absence of the Bishop. There was an early Celebration at 7:30 Wednesday morning, and a meeting of the Woman's Auxiliary in the church at 10 o'clock. The Board of Missions met at the same hour in the parish house, and heard reports from the different missions, and dispatched routine business. A letter was read from Bishop Neely, expressing his deep regret at not being able to attend, on account of his illness. An appreciative resolution was passed by the Board and telegraphed to the Bishop. The rector of St. Mary's gave the members of the Board of Missions and the Woman's Auxiliary a drive to Seal Harbor, which was highly enjoyed by all. At the evening session an address was delivered, after Evening Prayer, by the Rev. G. F. Degen, on "Diocesan institutions as missionary agencies," and one by the Rev. W. F. Livingstone, on "The parish or mission as a centre of influence."

Mission Work

The Rev. J. C. Quinn is in charge of a group of missions whose centre is Winn, in Penobscot Co. He holds regular service every Sunday morning in Winn, has good congregations, and also in the evening, except twice a month, when he has to be in Kingman. He holds service at Lincoln once a month at 3 p.m., in a hall, with fair attendance, and hopes, with the beginning of Advent, to hold evening services in Montague at 7:30 P. M., driving there from Lincoln, some 11 miles. Kingman is the hardest part of his field, difficult to work in winter and spring, owing to bad roads. The services there are twice a month in the evening, the 2d and 4th Sundays. Attendance is variable; when there is no M. E. service, the church is usually filled with an attentive congregation. Owing to the business depression, many of our Church people have left. At Macwahoc, 11 miles from Winn, he has resumed services twice a month at 3 P. M., on his way to Kingman. Early in the spring he began a monthly service at Wytotiplock, on the M. C. R. R., on week evenings. There has been good attendance, but the people are very poor.

Colorado

John Franklin Spalding, Bishop

A correspondent sends the following: "Canon Byrne took his last official service in the cathedral on the 15th Sunday after Trinity. He read the litany with quite as much voice as the dean, although he is in his 93d year. On account of the rheumatic condition of Mrs. Byrne, who has been his faithful wife for more than 60 years, it was imperative that they should be cared for by their son and daughter, who live in the Canon's own home at Littleton. He will remain on the cathedral staff as long as he lives. It is no little blessing to a community to have before them an example of so long a life of total abstinence, continued activity, and faithful service. Although removed from the missionary list, and also the chapter, still his wants have been supplied by the Society for Infirm Clergy and by the cathedral. He leaves the city with the good wishes and affection of the whole community."

Ohio

Wm. Andrew Leonard, D.D., Bishop

The Rev. G. F. Patterson, formerly of Sedalia, Mo., held his first service at the church of the Incarnation, Cleveland, of which he has taken charge, on the 18th Sunday after Trinity. This parish was formerly in charge of the Rev. Wemyss T. Smith, in connection with the church of the Good Shepherd.

Guild of the Holy Cross

The annual meeting was held on Holy Cross Day, Sept. 14th, at St. James' church, Cleveland. The exercises opened with the celebration of the Holy Communion at 7:30, the Rev. Mr. Schultz, rector of the parish, celebrant. A second service and Celebration was held at 10:30, after which a luncheon was served in the parish house, and a business meeting followed. Miss Mary F. Bolles gave an interesting report of the work of the guild for the past year. Sister Frances Anna, of the Sisterhood of St. Mary, told of the work being done in the Children's Home at Memphis, in care of the Sisters. The children are chiefly from the families of the "poor whites" of the South, and they are taught, and trained to support themselves when they leave the Home. The special offerings of the guild are at present given to this work. All officers of the past year were re-elected: The Rev. T. C. Foote, chaplain; Miss Mary F. Bolles, warden; Mrs. Herbert Foote, secretary; Miss Helen Convy, treasurer, and Miss Cobb, librarian.

Daughters of the King

The eighth semi-annual meeting of the local assembly of the Daughters of the King for this diocese, was held in St. Paul's church, Akron, Sept. 16th. The programme consisted of a morning session, with a sermon by the Rev. Robert Kell, chaplain of the order, followed by the celebration of the Holy Communion, the Rev. Messrs. James H. W. Blake and Robert Kell being celebrants. The cities represented were Akron, Warren, Youngstown, Cuyahoga Falls, Kent, Ravenna, Hudson, and Elyria, there being about 30 Daughters present, besides a number of visitors. After the service the delegates were invited to the dining-room, where lunch had been prepared. The business session was called to order at 1:45, and was opened with a hymn and devotional exercises by the chaplain. The roll call showed 11 delegates present. There were also about 12 members of the junior organization, "Children of the King." Reports were read from all chapters represented, and also from three chapters which sent in reports to the secretary. The introductory address by the president, Miss Brenneman, was excellent. This was followed by a few well-chosen words of welcome by the Rev. James H. W. Blake, rector of St. Paul's church, Akron. The report of the secretary-treasurer showed a surplus of $3 17 after all expenses had been paid. The collection of the morning amounted to $3 34, making the amount on hand $6.51. The election of officers followed.

The balloting resulted in the election of Miss Conzett as president, and Miss Jewett as secretary-treasurer. Mr. Kell was re-elected chaplain. Then followed the Daughters' hymn, after which several very interesting papers were read. The first, entitled, "Daughters of the King," was by Mrs. Moncure, of Philadelphia, Pa. The second, by Louise Hinde, of Cuyahoga Falls, was a paper on "The Children of the King," and gave a very delightful account of the work done by that organization. "The Children of the King—Seniors," by Miss Mary Hawkins, of Cuyahoga Falls, showed how much work can really be done by the younger ladies of a parish. After another hymn a very fine paper, entitled, "Home workers," was read by Miss May Robinson, of Warren. The last paper was entitled "Sacrifices," by Miss Jewett. The Rev. George P. Atwater made a few appropriate remarks. A motion was carried to extend a vote of thanks to the late president for her faithful work of the last two years. After routine business, a hymn, and the prayers of the Order, the meeting adjourned.

Virginia

Francis M. Whittle, D. D., LL. D., Bishop

Robert A. Gibson, D.D., Bishop-Coadjutor

A very strong effort is being made among the members of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew in Richmond, to secure the 15th annual convention in that city in 1900. The chief difficulty is the lack of a hall of sufficient seating capacity.

Continued Illness of Dr. Carmichael

It is believed that the Rev. Hartley Carmichael, D.D., rector of St. Paul's church, Richmond, will be unable to resume his duties for some time to come. Several months ago he was granted leave of absence until Oct. 1st, but the latest advices from Montreal give little hope at the present time of his recovery, his nervous system having completely broken down.

Southern Virginia

Alfred M. Randolph, D.D., LL.D., Bishop

On Monday, Sept. 11th, a meeting of the Standing Committee was held, when the Rev. John B. Brown was recommended to the Bishop for Deacons' Orders, and the Rev. Scott Wood for Priests' Orders. Consent was also given to the consecration of the Rev. William Loyall Gravatt to be Bishop-coadjutor of the diocese of West Virginia.

South Carolina

Ellison Capers, D.D., Bishop

Bishop Capers has for some weeks been recruiting at his summer home on Cedar Mountain, having been much shocked and grieved by the death of his gallant son-in-law, Captain Saterlee, U. S. A., who died suddenly at his post in the Philippines.

On Sept. 17th, Messrs. Harold Thomas and C. W. Boyd were to be ordained to the diaconate in the church of the Good Shepherd, Columbia, S. C. These young men are recent graduates of the University of the South, at Sewanee, Tenn. Mr. Thomas has been assigned by the Bishop to take charge of the mission church, St. Timothy's, in Columbia, S. C. Mr. Boyd will be in charge of the missions at Glenn Springs, Blacksburg, and Gaffney.

Church of the Advent, Spartenburg

The Rev. Theodore Bratton, D.D., having accepted the appointment of rector and principal of St. Mary's Female College, Raleigh, N. C., this congregation has called the Rev. J. D. Magruder, of Mississippi, a graduate of the Divinity School in Sewanee, Tenn. Mr. Magruder will come to his new parish Oct. 1st.

Work Among the Colored People

An industrial orphanage is soon to be established near Columbia, the work of the Rev. Richard Carroll who has been enabled by the help of people at the North, and citizens of Columbia, to secure a valuable property. The building will be commenced at once. Besides the orphanage, Mr. Carroll proposes to establish a hospital and training school for nurses, with Archdeacon Joyner as trustee and director. Mr. Carroll enjoys the confidence of the leading business men of Columbia.

North Carolina

Joseph Blount Cheshire, Jr., D.D., Bishop

The jurisdiction of Asheville held its fifth annual convention Sept. 13th, in Grace church, Morganton.

The Rev. John F. George who has been rector of St. Paul's parish, Winston, for the past six years, has sent in his resignation, and accepted a call to the rectorship of St. John's church, Rockville, Conn., to take effect Oct. 1st. Since Mr. George's connection with St. Paul's, many additions have been made to the communicant list, and a heavy parish debt nearly cancelled.

The Rev. B. S. Bronson, rector of Emmanuel church, Warrenton, has succeeded the Rev. W. J. Smith as dean of the convocation of Tarboro. Mr. Smith was elected dean in November, 1892, and held this office until May of the present year.

Need of Missionary Work and Funds

The secretary of the executive missionary committee for the diocese reports the following: "Out of 94 parishes and mission stations, only 58 have contributed anything at all toward the missionary work within our limits; 36 not giving one cent, and of those who did give anything, the per capita offering was only about 36½ cents. There are five counties in the diocese in which the Church has no representation whatever."

Maryland

William Paret, D.D., LL.D., Bishop

At the request of the archdeacon, the fall meeting of the archdeaconry of Annapolis to be held in St. James' church, Annapolis, has been postponed from Oct. 25th to Nov. 15th, so as to enable the Bishop to attend the meeting of the House of Bishops, and the archdeacon to attend the Missionary Council at St. Louis, Mo. Mr. George Forbes, of Annapolis, who for some years has acted as secretary, has resigned because of his removal to New York.

St. Katherine's Mission

This mission for colored people, which for the past five years has been at work under the care of the clergy of Mt. Calvary church and the Sisters of All Saints, will shortly occupy the house, corner Gilmor and Presstman sts., Baltimore, which has been purchased for its use. In addition to regular services, a kindergarten for colored children will be maintained.

Editorials and Contributions

REFERENCE was recently made in these columns to a serious danger which seemed to threaten Christian schools in Japan, under the new treaty regulations. We are very glad to hear that the worst, in this case, as in most cases, is not likely to happen. Those well qualified to speak assure us that the government of Japan will take no step tending to the discouragement of Christian schools. We trust that The Church in Japan, the official organ of our missions in that country, will give us reliable and speedy information to allay any possible misgivings on this subject. Reports of threatened changes of policy in Japan are not only disquieting, but may be financially disastrous.

REPARATION and not expiation is foreshadowed in France, by the pardon of Dreyfus. The conscience of a great nation is not to be much longer stifled by brandy and absinthe crazed politicians and army officers. It has been not alone with the fate of the unfortunate victim of the military conspiracy that the world has been concerned, but also with the apparent degeneracy of a people who have held such a place of pre-eminence in the civilization of the world. France will not, cannot, stop short of a complete vindication of the honor of the man whom she has so cruelly wronged; and in the process of restoring him she will save herself from the monstrous corruption of a militarism under which she has once before been humiliated. By the revelations of the Dreyfus trial, France may be saved from a second Sedan. M. Zola has spoken the right word: "When honor has been restored formally to the condemned man, honor will be restored to France—not before."

A New Argument for Theism

MR. JOHN FISKE, in his recent volume on natural religion, contends strongly against the notion that religion is a delusive phantom, and that it is destined to die out as humanity becomes more enlightened. This notion has been made more or less familiar through the literature of Positivism and of the disciples of Evolution. The religious instincts, the presence of which cannot be denied, and which, so far as can be discovered, are co-eval with the appearance of the human race, are represented as abnormal features of the mental constitution. There is nothing to correspond to them in the realm of actual existence. These instincts, therefore, are destined to disappear as the reign of science extends and the race attains a higher stage of advancement. But facts are stubborn things, and to account for the presence and long persistence of religious ideas, has not been easy. Neither is it easy to dismiss with a wave of the hand a whole sphere of things which have had such a decisive influence upon human history. Those who in the higher regions of thought and philosophic theorizing, have deliberately endeavored to emancipate themselves from the influence of religious feeling, have found the task a difficult one. It has often come in the end to an exchange of old forms of belief for new, and such persons have sometimes amazed their fellow-men by subjecting themselves to systems or movements commonly regarded as superstitions, beneath the notice of sensible people.

ON the other hand, among those of a lower order, where the religious instinct has become blunted, or, to all appearance, exterminated, it will not be contended that this has gone along with any kind of elevation. On the contrary, the result is inevitable degradation, intellectual and moral. So true is this that it has been common for the philosopher who imagines that he himself has risen above the necessity of religion, to concede the imperative need of it for the "masses." Though there be no God, yet for the sake of the majority He must be invented. The wise man involuntarily draws back when he attempts to picture to himself what the world would become without the restraints of religion. What he perceives is nothing less than a relapse into savagery. The significance of this is not always seen. It is an admission that the world, at least as it now is, cannot get along without religion. That is to say, what progress and improvement have so far been gained cannot be retained; and further progress, in the case of the great majority, cannot be made without religion. What a paradox, then, to maintain that this element, so essential to any true advance, is a pure phantom—nothing more than a happy delusion!

IT is at this point that Mr. Fiske joins issue with others of his own school. A few years ago a brilliant writer maintained with great force that the Evolutionists were at fault in leaving religion out of the scientific scheme, as a mere transient phenomenon, without any profound or permanent significance. Mr. Kidd showed very convincingly that, in fact, the processes of evolution working for the advancement of the race would, to all intents and purposes, be ineffective without religion. The restraints which religion throws around the social life of men create a condition of things in which it is possible for the elements of progress to fulfill their perfect work. Without such restraints it is difficult to see how any advance could be made beyond the savage state. Mr. Kidd does not definitely concern himself with the truth or falsity of religion, or with its character, beyond the power which it has of restraining men within due limits. It seemed clear that his argument required, not simply that there should be a religion, but that for the best and most enduring results, there must be a true religion.

MR. FISKE attempts to prove not only the fact that religion has been closely connected with the highest achievements of progress, but that, on the principles of the evolution philosophy itself, it cannot be a delusion. Whatever we may think of that philosophy, and whatever doubts we may entertain whether it is capable of solving all the secrets of the universe, it is deeply interesting to note how this one of its latest disciples is brought to the point of insisting upon the truth of the fundamental postulates of religion, and that there are eternal verities, corresponding to the highest religious ideas. He is able to see, in the first place, that so far back as we are able to trace the history of religion, "the theory has comprised three essential elements: First, belief in Deity, as quasi human"; that is, as we are accustomed to say, belief in a God, or gods possessing personality; "secondly, belief in an unseen world in which human beings continue to exist after death; thirdly, recognition of the ethical aspects of human life as related in a special and intimate sense to this unseen world."

THESE three elements, personality in the Godhead, immortal life beyond the grave, and an ineradicable sense of responsibility, will no doubt be admitted by all as essential elements in every form of religion, though it is worth notice in passing, that the clearness of insight by which precisely these three are singled out as having a transcendent importance, would seem to come only through the training of Christian thought.

Mr. Fiske then asks whether these elements, the subject-matter of religion, have a real and substantial character, or are merely a figment of the imagination? "Has religion through all these weary centuries been dealing with an eternal verity, or has it been blindly groping after a phantom?" It is this question which he has set himself to answer. The history of life on the globe, he tells us, is a history of adjustments bringing about an ever-closer contact between the inner life and the world environing. "Every stage of enlargement has had reference to actual existences outside." This may be illustrated in multitudinous ways. There came a time in this history when the last and highest of creatures came upon the scene. And religion was co-eval with humanity; and, moreover, it has played such a dominant part "in the evolution of human society" that the mind is at a loss to imagine what could have taken place without it.

"ALL the analogies of evolution are overwhelmingly against" the supposition that man in submitting himself to the domination of religion, was obeying that which had no existence outside his own mistaken mind. In every other instance progress has been achieved through adjustment of the inward to an actual outward. But to suppose that there is no personal God, no future life, and no accountability for human action extending into the unseen world, is to assume that in the most advanced stages of progress, where the noblest results have been attained, this law, hitherto so universal, has been altered. What we see now is no longer an adjustment to outward facts actually existing, but to imagined facts, the mere figment of the brain. It certainly follows that if man had known that all these "weary ages" religion had no objective reality, he could never have reached his present stage of intellectual and moral elevation. It is therefore concluded that according to the principles of evolution the three great elements essential to religion must be eternally true. In Mr. Fiske's words: "Of all the implications of the doctrine of evolution with regard to man, I believe the very deepest and strongest to be that which asserts the everlasting reality of religion."

WE may take Mr. Fiske's work as exhibiting natural religion in its latest form. The intention is still to present it as the substitute for supernatural religion. It has at least the advantage of making no pretence to be the same thing in a new clothing. But two remarks suggest themselves. The first may be put in the form of a question. Is it at all probable that such a statement of natural religion could have been made by any but a man born and bred in a Christian country, and familiar from boyhood with the principles of the Christian faith? The other is as follows: Every stage of evolution, we are told, is due to adjustments of the inward to the outward, of life in the individual to the actually existing facts of the world which environs him. If this has been the case in all the countless periods which cover the lower stages, it must be so in those which cover the higher. But while in the lower stages the environment comprised things of the visible world, in the higher region the things to be reckoned with are things of the world unseen—God, immortality, eternal judgment. It is not possible to dismiss these realities as if they belonged to the same category with the visible and tangible things of which science takes cognizance.

IT may be that Mr. Fiske's "postulates of religion" involve more than he has been willing to face. Take, for instance, the first, that the idea of God is necessarily "quasi-human," that it is the idea of a personality in sympathy and even kinship with humanity. The argument is that the tremendous and effective part this idea has fulfilled in the progress and elevation of humanity, is a convincing proof, on the fundamental principles of evolution, that the Divine Object exists corresponding to that idea. May we not press the matter somewhat further? It is surely needful to examine what is comprehended in this idea of a quasi-human Person. The visible world of nature is evident to the senses; it may be explored and its secrets brought to light through the investigations of science. But the supernatural sphere, the world of the unseen, is not open to such investigation. Its secrets, even those most essential for moral guidance and spiritual development, must remain forever hidden unless they are disclosed to us by some beneficent Power beyond ourselves. According to Mr. Fiske, such a Power exists, a Power whose characteristic is love, and whose sympathy and kinship with humanity is infinitely close. Does not this bear us on irresistibly to the expectation of a revelation from above? The influence of nature's environment is impressed upon us through the senses, and through its effects upon the physical organization. But intelligence speaks to intelligence in another way. It is chiefly through speech, or that which answers to speech, that the impress is felt of spirit upon spirit. It seems to us, therefore, that in the argument before us is involved the truth of a Divine Revelation. And can it be shown that the idea of God has ever acted as a truly elevating and energizing power, except where it has been believed that God has revealed Himself after a manner corresponding to the nature of that unseen sphere to which He essentially belongs, a sphere not within the scope of the physical senses, but of the soul and spirit? Much as we dissent from some of the positions taken in his work, it still seems to us that the main argument of Mr. Fiske leaves the door open for revealed or supernatural religion as necessary to the crowning and completion of natural religion. In a word, the latter raises questions which the former alone can answer.

"A Defence of Profanity"

BY REV. HERBERT M. CLARKE, PH.D.

THE "defence" referred to in the title of this article is not mine, but as we shall presently see, is made by one of the most popular authors of the day. Even in these times of greatly increased refinement in the use of language, persons may be found who excuse profanity as a thing which, without being quite justifiable, is yet a very pardonable offense. There is no civil law against it, or if there is, it is not enforced; it does not injure anybody's person or property, and so they are inclined to think that it is not so very bad after all.

Recent writers on this subject take comfort in the thought that profanity in these days is much rarer than it was once. It has now become a mark of vulgarity, so that many who have no fear of God before their eyes, are restrained from swearing through their fear of Mrs. Grundy. Ladies may be led to imagine that this vice is nearly extinct, because they so seldom hear anybody swear. But one has only to sit in the office of some country hotel filled with farmers, commercial travelers, and other people of the middle classes of American society, to hear men talk with whom almost every third word is some kind of blasphemy. It is a habit they have formed, and they probably think it quite a harmless habit. They are honest, respectable men. If they were taken to task for profane swearing, they would probably maintain that it is a matter of very little importance, and that one who objected to it was quite too straight-laced and puritanical. They would not like to hear a woman swear, nor a clergyman, nor a schoolmaster, but ordinary men do not need to be so particular. Indeed, we come here to that strange phenomenon, the differing moral standards which popular opinion sets up for different classes of people. There are some who talk as if the laws of God were meant only for women and children, as if men—especially young men—were in great measure exempt. "Boys will be boys," they say, and "youth will have its fling." By such sayings they excuse the most degrading vice, and the most contemptible neglect of duty.

"There is no God, the young man saith,
Or truly, if there may be,
He surely did not mean a man
Should always be a baby."

A false argument is sometimes employed to dissuade men from swearing, the same argument from profit and loss which we find in the very questionable adage, "Honesty is the best policy." "You ought not to swear," they say, "because you gain nothing by it." So I remember once reading somewhere, that when Satan catches a man through profanity, it is much the same as a fisherman catching a fish with an unbaited hook. But this surely is not correct. There must be some inducement, or else no one would be tempted to swear. We are never tempted by things which we do not care for. There must be some object before the mind of the boy when he first begins to swear. The temptation to swear gets its strength from two things. In the first place, it gratifies the imitative propensity which is so strong in the young. A boy living among blasphemous talkers catches their profane expressions by pure imitation, and learns to swear much in the same way that a parrot picks up the words which it utters. The boy is apt to regard swearing as a sign of manliness. He is in haste to become a man and so he learns to swear and smoke and drink whiskey because that is what men do.

Secondly, swearing undoubtedly furnishes a certain relief to the feelings in times of great provocation. One of our popular writers does not hesitate to defend it on this ground. In that very entertaining book called "Idle Thoughts of an Idle Fellow," Mr. Jerome K. Jerome defends swearing as a sort of safety valve, preventing the cherishing of an evil temper. "I think," he says, "that it does a man good to swear. Swearing is the safety valve through which the bad temper that might otherwise do serious internal injury to his mental mechanism escapes in harmless vapor." * * Swearing has the same soothing effect upon our angry passions that smashing the furniture or slamming the doors is so well known to exercise; added to which it is much cheaper. Swearing clears a man out like a penn'orth of gun powder does the wash-house chimney. An occasional explosion is good for both. I rather distrust a man who never swears, or savagely kicks the footstool, or pokes the fire with unnecessary violence. Without some outlet, the anger caused by the ever-occurring troubles of life is apt to rankle and fester within. The petty annoyance, instead of being thrown from us, sits down beside us, and becomes a sorrow, and the little offence is brooded over till, in the hot bed of rumination, it grows into a great injury, under whose poisonous shadow spring up hatred and revenge."

Now this is perhaps as plausible a defence of occasional profanity as can be made. But it fails in two ways—first, logically, and second, morally. Logically, it is not because swearing is profane that it relieves the feelings, but because it is exclamatory. But there are many innocent interjections, ejaculations, and exclamations which can be used to express sudden emotion, and thus furnish the safety valve which Mr. Jerome requires. He says that slamming a door is a desirable relief to the feelings, and that has been called a woman's way of swearing. It would be better indeed to slam the door or dance about the room, or indulge in any other violent gesticulation rather than take God's name in vain. Both good manners and Christian principles require us to put a curb on the manifestation of our feelings. In Oriental countries it is, or used to be, the custom to manifest violent grief or rage by tearing the hair or rending the garments, but who would wish such a custom to be introduced into America?

Furthermore, one cannot help observing that profane men swear when they are not at all excited. If they would reserve their profanity for occasions of violent emotion, it would not be quite so bad. But they swear in cold blood, in talking about the most commonplace matters. The safety-valve theory does not apply.

But this apology for swearing fails morally. In morals, of course, the question is never whether a thing is expedient, but whether it is right. Even though it relieves the feelings to swear, if swearing is wrong, that ends the discussion, for a good end never justifies wrong means. The real question about profanity is not how it makes the profane man feel, but how it is regarded by God. The reason that profanity is such a dreadful sin is because it is an insult to God to use His sacred name in a trifling or irreverent way. That God regards swearing as a wrong done to Himself, a wrong which must not be condoned or overlooked, He has Himself expressly declared: "The Lord will not hold him guiltless that taketh His name in vain."

If you had lost the use of your vocal organs, and some skillful physician had performed an operation by which you obtained again the power of speech, you would not be so lost to all feelings of gratitude as to employ your regained faculty in insulting your benefactor. Yet that is what those do who blaspheme God. Those who utter profane words are abusing one of the best gifts which they possess to offend and insult the Giver.

Letters to the Editor

THE ARCHBISHOPS' DECISION

To the Editor of The Living Church:

There are many who would like to be informed on two points raised by the recent decision of the two Archbishops in England. They are these: First, what Act of Uniformity has now the force of law in England? Is it the Act of Elizabeth in 1562, or the Act of Charles II., after the Savoy Conference in 1662?

The Archbishops seem to think that so far as the Church is concerned, all that occurred between 1562 and 1662 is a blank, and that Elizabeth still reigns. We were taught that the Ecclesia Docens in England to-day is based upon the settlement of 1662, and not that of 1562.

Second, we should like to inquire whether the issue which the Bishop of Springfield made in 1897, directly after the Lambeth Conference, of that year, does not receive some confirmation by the recent decision of the Archbishops? He concluded his address, after enumerating a number of reasons against any organization of the Anglican Communion under existing conditions, in these words: "These questions bring to an issue the point, that any organization of the Anglican Communion under existing conditions, places this august Communion under the domination of the Crown of Great Britain."

The Archbishops seem to lean to the conviction that the Church of England is the creation of the State. Is this not so? E. N. R.

DIVINITY SCHOOLS FOR COLORED MEN

To the Editor of The Living Church:

"Alfred Poole Grint," in the last issue of THE LIVING CHURCH, commenting upon divinity schools for colored men, says that I was "sadly mistaken in supposing that a colored man is welcome to pursue his studies at our divinity schools." And yet in his very next statement he proves exactly the opposite, for he specifies only two institutions where colored men are not welcome, and these two are the exceptions to the rule. There are colored priests to-day in the ministry of the Church who have graduated from the General, in New York; the Western, in Chicago; the school in Cambridge; Nashotah, and Seabury. The only two institutions refusing to receive and welcome colored men, are Sewanee and the Virginia school at Alexandria. Now, I ask the question in good faith, if the authorities in these dioceses deem it proper to have special "colored" concerns because of their unwillingness to receive colored men in the institutions already established, is it just and fair to expect Churchmen of the North to contribute the money for the support of these unnecessary institutions, when there are institutions that will most gladly welcome colored men?

MISSIONARY LITERATURE

To the Editor of The Living Church:

"No missionary literature worthy of the name," quoted and endorsed by you (Sept. 9th) from The Churchman, (Aug. 26th), may be true of "much that we find in our journals," etc. May I call your attention to a paper read at the last mission conference in North Tokyo, as it appears on p. 107, July number of The Church in Japan, the official organ of the missionary districts of Tokyo and Kyoto? It is entitled, "Cast the net on the right side." It is the earnest plea of the Rev. H. S. Jefferys who, with his wife, daughter of the late Rev. Dr. H. W. Beers, of California, has been for ten years actively at work in that most interesting field which is to rule the Orient. His paper proclaims "Hongo-Ku, the seat of the Imperial University, the First High School, the Tokyo Library, the Military Arsenal, the Botanical Gardens, and other institutions, as the habitat of the picked youth of the empire," for whom the Church might fitly provide the very best workers of two races, if only their support were assured. Another paper, by the Rev. Isaac Dooman, appears in The Church Standard (Sept. 16th), on "A Nation in Need of a Religion," and the selection of such communications compensates for much that seems childish. Probably "the men on the spot" where work is done, are giving us "wider information of the circumstances under which they are working," than we are willing to read. Our general secretaries have been men of wonderful faith and power in continuous, steady work. I fear that we have failed to do our duty in prayer and in liberal giving for the Church's missionary work. "A Notable Missionary Gathering," (on p. 408 of your issue of the 9th), gives evidence that the work goes on, and that experienced laborers, as well as new hands, are speeding to the field. Let us not forget them.

Michaelmas

BY THE REV. EDWARD A. RAND

O hark! what sounds of battle-charge
Are rumbling overhead?
The great archangel routs the foe,
Though by the dragon led.

Far sweeter is that triumph-roar
Than mildest evening breeze,
With murmurs musical and low,
Amid the forest trees.

And longest thou for help like this?
Then listen all who will!
God's Word proclaims the banner truth
Of angels with us still.

For is the battle sore to-day?
In faith, press on the fight!
Ho! ho! St. Michael leads the charge!
Now hard the dragon smite!

"CHURCH DEFENCE" is the title of a monthly paper, of which the first issue has reached the Editor's Table. It is devoted to the maintenance of Catholic Church principles and order against the encroachments of the Broad Church movement which threatens to make shreds and patches of Holy Scripture, and to reduce the Faith of the Church to an iridescent dream. We are pleased to note that the work which THE LIVING CHURCH has been doing along this line for twenty years, is appreciated by Church Defence, as indicated by numerous quotations from our columns and by editorial comment. This periodical is published in New York, the name of the editor not being given; it is understood, however, that the Rev. Dr. Clendenin has been active in the enterprise. The ordination of Dr. Briggs and other danger signs in the East have alarmed the conservative and Catholic Churchmen in New York, and they have felt constrained to take united action. Church Defence is to be the organ of an active campaign, and its first issue indicates that this will be carried on with vigor. The cut on the first page (if we may be allowed a gentle criticism), while it may attract attention, seems hardly consistent with the seriousness of the situation.

THE REV. JOSEPH M. FRANCIS, D.D., whose portrait appears on the cover-page this week, was born April 6th, 1862, at Eaglesmere, Pa. Five years later, upon the death of his father, the family removed to the old home, in Philadelphia, where Mr. Francis grew to manhood. For eight years he was a student at the Episcopal Academy, and then took a collegiate course at Racine, Wis. Mr. Francis' theological course was pursued under the supervision of Bishop Welles, of Milwaukee, for whom he filled the position of secretary for several years. In All Saints' cathedral, Milwaukee, on St. Thomas' Day, Dec. 21, 1884, came his ordination as deacon, followed by his elevation to the priesthood, on Dec. 19, 1886. During his diaconate, the Rev. Mr. Francis was connected with the cathedral, where he had charge of two missions—St. Edmund's, North Milwaukee, and St. Peter's, Greenfield, and, later, attended the University of Oxford, and received some training in parochial work, both in Oxford and Dublin. Returning to his native land in 1886, he was for a few months resident canon of the cathedral, Milwaukee. In June, 1887, he was married to Miss Stevens, of Milwaukee, and at once entered on the rectorship of St. Luke's church, Whitewater, Wis. This charge was retained for a year and a half, during which time the church debt was paid. On Christmas Day, of 1888, the Rev. Mr. Francis, with his wife, started on the long journey to Japan, where he became Bishop Williams' assistant at Trinity church, Tokyo, now the cathedral. He was elected by the convocation a professor in Trinity Divinity School, Tokyo, at first doing part of the work of Old Testament Exegesis. Later, he became professor of Ecclesiastical History and Systematic Divinity, and in 1894, was appointed sub-dean of the school. By concurrent action of the English Bishop of North Tokyo, Mr. Francis was appointed a member of the Standing Committee of the Japanese Church. He also served as delegate to the General Convention of the Japanese Church, and in 1895, was elected by the mission convocation to the General Convention, at Minneapolis. Mr. Francis was the first editor and manager of the official magazine of the Japan mission, The Church in Japan. In January, 1898, he became rector of St. Paul's church, Evansville, Ind., since which time his record as an earnest and successful priest has been fully attested by the prosperity of his parish. As recorded elsewhere, he has now been consecrated Bishop of Indiana.

Pen-and-Ink-lings

AN old farmer who had been to the metropolis was describing to his friends the splendor of the hotel at which he stayed. "Everything was perfect," said he, "all but one thing—they kept the light burning all night in my bedroom, a thing I ain't used to."

"Well," said one wag, "why didn't you blow it out?"

"Blow it out!" said the farmer. "How could I? The pesky thing was inside a bottle!"—Collier's Weekly.

MRS. Humphry Ward has written a letter to the London Times in which she appeals to the High Churchmen of the Anglican Church to make it possible for Unitarians to enter the Anglican fold. She pleads for modifications in the terms of personal subscription. "It is," says The Congregationalist, "a peculiar act of a woman blessed with more than usual perspicuity in most matters. A more futile plea could scarcely be imagined."

THE London correspondent of The Episcopal Recorder, of Philadelphia, writes of the circumstances attending the publication of a new edition of the Bible by a Glasgow house, in illustration of the care taken in printing the Scriptures. It may not be generally known, it says, that in Scotland anybody may print the Scriptures, but before publishing any edition a copy of it must be read by a government official and duly licensed. The edition issued by the Glasgow firm was so small that two or three copies will go into the waistcoat pocket, and the reading of it no ordinary eyesight can manage without the aid of a magnifying glass. But this microscopic Bible had to be perused from beginning to end before the law allowed it to be licensed for publication.

WOMEN may find food for thought in the following from Scribner's Magazine:

Woman's inhumanity to man is a good deal in evidence. The late Senator Morton, of Indiana, was, it will be remembered, an invalid and a cripple. He came into a company at the capitol one day in a state of great indignation because, in a street-car crowded with young women, not one had offered him a seat, and he had been compelled to make the journey painfully and precariously supported upon his crutches. The like of this may very often be seen. Humanity, consideration for weakness and helplessness, is the root of which chivalry is the fine flower. It is a startling proposition that man's inhumanity to man is less than woman's, but the time seems to give it some proof. At any rate, a man evidently disabled would not be allowed to stand in a public conveyance in which able-bodied men were seated, even in the most unchivalrous part of our country, which I have given some reasons for believing to be the city of New York. And, if that be true, it seems that the assumption of the right of an able-bodied woman to remain seated while a disabled man is standing, is an assumption that the claims of chivalry are superior to those of humanity. On the other hand, it may fairly be said that the selfishness of women, with regard to the wayfaring man, is more thoughtless and perfidious than the selfishness of men with regard to the wayfaring woman. In this country, at least, this latter is in all cases felt to be a violation of propriety and decency. The native American feels himself to be both on his defence and without defence, when he is arraigned for it.

RETORT courteous: Schubert, on going home one evening, was beset by two tipsy young fellows who insisted on having an impromptu poem from him, and who would not let him go a step further till he had produced one. "Well, then," said Schubert to the speaker, "what is your name?" "My name," said he, "is Fesele." "And mine," said his companion, "is Klumpp." Thereupon the poet produced the following:

Wird man das F from Fesel reissen
Und das K from Klump;
So wird der Eine, Eesel heissen
Und der Andere, Lump.

Which in English is this:

If you the F from Fesel take,
And then the K from Klump,
'Twill of the one an Eesel (ass) make,
And of the other just a Lump (scamp).

AN interesting experiment in turning large farms into small holdings, which may help to solve the agricultural problem in England, was completed in Dorsetshire. Sir Robert Edgecombe, several years ago, bought a farm of 343 acres, spent money in building roads and wells, divided it up into twenty-five holdings of from two to thirty-three acres, and offered them for sale, payment to be made in ten equal annual installments. Purchasers were readily found of all trades and classes, eight only being agricultural laborers, and all the installments, with slight exceptions, have already been paid off. Instead of a farmer and three laborers, there are now twenty-five families of seventy-five persons on the land, which has increased in value from £170 to £313 a year.

The Higher Criticism Applied to a Modern Instance

IN this note I endeavor to apply the critical principles with which we are familiar, when applied to "the Hexateuch," to a well-known ode of the poet Burns. I shall endeavor to show that it must have proceeded from at least two "sources," with a probable admixture by a third hand in the last stanza; which, after approved precedent, I venture to ascribe to a "compiler" who "appears to have introduced slight additions of his own." I shall distinguish the sources as B1 and B2, and the compiler as C. The ode consists of nine stanzas, and it will be seen at a glance that the principal line of demarcation falls after the fifth of these. The first five I assign to B1, the next three unhesitatingly to B2, while of the last I speak with more reserve, and leave to more curious and minute critics the question in what proportions it is to be divided between B2 and C. I fear I shall hardly make my remarks intelligible without a transcript of the greater part of the poem, which, happily, is not long:

TO A MOUNTAIN DAISY

ON TURNING ONE DOWN WITH A PLOUGH, IN APRIL, 1786

Wee, modest, crimson-tipped flower,
Thou's met me in an evil hour;
For I maun crush amang the stoure
Thy slender stem:
To spare thee now is past my power,
Thou bonny gem.

Alas! it's no thy neebor sweet,
The bonny lark, companion meet,
Bending thee 'mang the dewy weed
Wi' speckled breast.
When upward springing, blithe to greet
The purpling East!

* * * * *
The flaunting flowers our gardens yield,
High shelt'ring woods and wa's maun shield,
But thou, beneath the random bield
O' clod or stane,
Adorns the histie stibble-field,
Unseen, alane.
* * * * *

Above each row of asterisks marks a stanza missed, and here the above "line of demarcation" occurs. I proceed to B2, in four stanzas, the last modified by C:

Such is the fate of artless maid,
Sweet flow'ret of the rural shade!
By love's simplicity betrayed,
And guileless trust,
Till she, like thee, all soiled, is laid
Low i' the dust.

Such is the fate of simple bard,
On life's rough ocean luckless starred!
Unskilful he to note the card
Of prudent lore,
Till billows rage, and gales blow hard,
And overwhelm him o'er!

Such fate to suffering worth is given,
Who long with wants and woes has striven,
By human pride or cunning driven
To mis'ry's brink,
Till wrenched of every stay but heaven
He, ruined, sink!

Even thou who mourn'st the daisy's fate,
That fate is thine—no distant date;
Stern ruin's ploughshare drives elate
Full on thy bloom,
Till crushed beneath the furrow's weight,
Shall be thy doom."

In B1 the dialect is the Scottish vernacular, in B2, the classic English meets us. Their differences are far more strongly marked than those on account of which certain metrical pieces in the Old Testament; e. g., the Song of Moses in Deut. xxxii, have been assigned to a poet of Northern Israel. For here the differences include that of grammatical form, and that of vocabulary, as well as that of divergent mouldings of words common to both dialects. The most glaring instance of grammatical form is that of the third person singular of the verb in classic English being used for the second in Scotch. This occurs five times in the five stanzas of B1—"Thou's [has] met," "Thou . . . adorns," and in the last two omitted stanzas, "Thou glinted forth," "Thou lifts," and "Thou lies." Contrast with these repeated instances the opposite one in the concluding stanzas: "Thou who mourn'st" for which B1 would certainly have given "Thou that mourns." A different vocabulary is shown by the terms stoure, weet, bield; modified word-forms meet us in maun, neebor, cauld, wa', and in the easily recognized amang, stane, alane, snawie; while in the phrase, the histie stibble field, we have an example of each of these two latter combined.

I have dwelt thus far on linguistic points. But the contrast in the thoughts presented is no less marked than that of language. Who does not see that pure physical objectivity characterizes B1, while B2 is marked by moral subjectivity and sentimental reflection? The former deals with rustic features which appeal directly and simply to the senses, like those of Mrs. Barbauld's "Ode to Spring." The latter exhibits in every stanza a new image of pathetic sadness. Moreover, the two differences correspond and confirm one another. The Northern dialect claims the physical realm as its own, and the Southern, the ethical. That B1 and B2 "form two clearly definable independent sources, is a conclusion that may be accepted without hesitation," since form and matter concur to establish it.

But, further, B2 "is marked by a series of recurring features which are absent from the other," and in it "particular formulæ are repeated with great frequency," considering the brevity of the work. Thus we have in stanza viii. "such is the fate of artless maid"; in vii., we have ditto repeated "of simple bard"; in vii., "such fate," with a slight variation, "to suffering worth"; while in ix., the variation from the norm, due, perhaps, as above suggested, to C, is greater, the phrase appearing as "that fate is thine," and being here transposed from the first to the second line of the stanza. Again, we have a precisely similar formulaic recurrence in the fifth line of every stanza in succession, "Till she, like thee. . . Till billows rage, . . . Till wrenched off, . . . Till crushed beneath," etc. This love of formulaic iterancy is wholly absent from B1, the "style" of which "is freer and more varied"; while these last four stanzas are "marked uniformly by the same distinctive and stereotyped phraseology" in each.

Yet more, B2 exhibits a "distinctive and stereotyped" syntactic form otherwise. In every one of its stanzas, except the last, the second and the third line form each a compound term constructed in apposition to a simple term in the first line, and yet not coupled to each other by any conjunction. To put it briefly, every such pair of lines forms apposed asyndeta. Thus to "maid" in stanza vi., line 1, is apposed "Sweet floweret of," etc., and again is apposed "by love's simplicity," etc. To "bard" in vii., 1, is apposed "On . . . luckless starred," and again is apposed "unskilful he," etc., where "he" virtually repeats the first term. Again, in viii., 1, "suffering worth" (a poetical abstraction for "a worthy man who suffers") has similarly attached to it its two following lines; and although helped by the relative "who," yet the effect is the same. Thus "sentences cast in the same type recur." From any such monotony of structure B1 is wholly free; not to mention that such a poetical abstraction as that just noticed is wholly foreign to his rustic muse. "Suffering worth" reminds us of Shakespeare's phrase, "patient merit," and this suggests that the author had access to sources of culture to which that of B1 was a stranger.

The compiler, whose hand we trace in the closing stanza, or else the poet of B2 had evidently, in his apostrophe to himself, "Even thou who mourn'st," reproduced a trace of Gray's "Elegy" in the stanza which links it to the personality of the poet.

For thee, who mindful of the unhonored dead,
Dost in these lines their artless tales relate, etc.

But he had forgotten that "thee" of the preceding stanzas is the daisy itself. Here, then, the hand of a compiler seems clearly betrayed. Of course we need not doubt that the poet of B2 had B1 before him, and adjusted a moral, or series of morals, to it; to which joint composition C puts some finishing touches, and thus completed "the process by which the 'Ode to the Daisy' assumed its present shape."

To sum up, then, B1 and B2 are distinct from each other, as being products respectively of a Northern and a Southern dialect; and this effects their grammatical form, including that of the verb personal, the vocabulary, and the type of word-moulding. They are distinct, also, in respect of marked phraseological recurrences, which one exhibits freely, while from the other they are wholly absent. They are distinct in respect to syntactical arrangement, which in B1 is free and varied, but in B2 tends to fall into a fixed norm. And they are even more strongly contrasted, if possible, in respect of subject-matter, and the absence or presence of implied references to other standard works. And "where," as in the case before us, "the differences are," in proportion to the very slight bulk of the whole, "at once numerous, recurrent, and systematic, they may be regarded as conclusive evidence that the compositions in which they occur are not the work of one and the same author."

But indeed we know from another poem in the same collection, in the same Northern dialect, and in the same metre, that B1 could moralize, when the fit seized him, and that, too, without forsaking his native rustic tongue. I will quote a short sample, only, from the stanzas "To a Mouse," whose nest, it seems, had been stirred by the same ploughshare which tore up the daisy:

Thou saw * the field laid bare an' waste
An' weary winter comin' fast,
An' cozie here, beneath the blast,
Thou thought * to dwell;
Till crash! the cruel coulter past
Out thro' thy cell.

That wee bit heap o' leaves an' stibble,
Hast cost thee mony a weary nibble.
Now thou's turn'd * out for a' thy trouble,
But * house or hald,
thole the winter's sleety dribble
An' cranreuch cauld!

Butt Mousie, thou art no thy lane
In proving foresight may be vain;
The best-laid schemes o' mice and men
Gang aft a-gley,
And lea'e us nought but grief and pain
For promis'd joy.

Still thou art blest, compar'd wi' me!

Here, then, we trace the hand and style of B1 throughout. Thus the argument from resemblance confirms that from difference; and both together lead us to an assured conviction that B1 and B2 are distinct and separate authors. In this last case, however, there is no B2, and therefore no room for the work of C.

I venture, therefore, to express the genesis of the "Ode to the Daisy" by the formula B1 plus B2 plus B2 multiplied by C. The quotations in inverted commas, where not from the poem itself, are from the valuable article of Professor S. R. Driver on "Genesis,"† in his enumeration of the characteristics which distinguish the P of the critics from their J or JE. Where the phrases of so distinguished an authority were so apposite to the purpose, it would have been a mere affectation of originality to invent new ones. I am not aware that I have omitted any of the tests applied by him. I am not conscious of using them in any changed sense; or if any change there be, it is a change to a fortiori; for e. g., the difference between Scotch vernacular and classic English is greater than any amount of difference in style where the vernacular used

* These will be recognized as examples of the dialectic usage of the personal verb above referred to in the text.

† "But," in the Northern dialect is a preposition "without."

‡ "Dict. of the Bible," 2d ed., I. ii. pp. 1149, foll.

is the same. Some may, perhaps, be led by the above to frame and apply a destructive hypothetical syllogism: "If A is B, then C is D; but if C be not D, then A is not B"; or, to clothe form with matter: "If the method of the Higher Criticism is trustworthy, then the above Ode must be by more than one author." Any who have got thus far will be able to judge for themselves whether this consequent is to be omitted or denied, and to clinch the argument accordingly.—CANON HAYMAN, in Sunday Magazine.

Book Reviews and Notices

Religion. By the Rev. W. C. E. Newbolt, Canon and Chancellor of St. Paul's, London. New York: Longmans, Green & Co. Pp. 301. Price, $1.50.

Every intelligent Churchman and Churchwoman ought to feel an interest in the "Oxford Library of Practical Theology," of which this is the first volume. The purpose of this important series is to translate sound and solid theological learning into the vernacular of everyday practical religion. This is a very laudable endeavor. Multitudes of busy people who would never look into a theological treatise, will read these attractive volumes with delight. One of the greatest needs of our day is for Catholic truth to be thrown into such a readable form as will commend it to the inquiring minds of the masses of our people. This need seems likely to be met by the series which Canon Newbolt has projected. The volumes thus far arranged for are as follows: Baptism, by the Rev. Darwell Stone; Confirmation, by the Bishop of Vermont; Holy Matrimony, by Canon Knox Little; The Prayer Book, by the Rev. Leighton Pullan; Prayer, by Canon Worlledge; the Holy Communion, by Father Puller; Religious Ceremonial, by the Rev. F. E. Brightman, librarian of Pusey House.

The initial volume of the series, with which we are just now especially concerned, is a work of singular interest, and ought to reach a wide circle of readers. "Religion" is a very familiar word, but the idea which it conveys to the ordinary mind is most hazy and indistinct. We suspect few people of the present day could tell what they mean by it. To have this idea cleared up, to have the nature and functions of religion defined, is a vital necessity to us all. Canon Newbolt defines it in a chapter of extreme interest as "the attitude towards God of one who has discovered His ownership, His wisdom, and His power." He then goes on to the consideration of such topics as Orthodoxy, Morality, The Higher Life, The Great Ideal as Exhibited in the Earthly Life of Our Lord, the Obstacles to Religion, External and Internal, The Expression of Religion in Worship and in Goodness, and The Divine Helps to Religion as Given in the Atonement and the Church. Thus it will be seen that he covers almost the whole wide range of religious knowledge and grapples with all the chief problems of human life. His method of treatment is fresh and original. There is not a dull page in the book, nor a chapter which does not open up practical questions of simply absorbing interest. The author is abundantly qualified to answer the restless, eager intellects of our day, and to set them at rest. Often he makes the time-honored truths of our holy religion stand out in new lights which cause them to glow with unimagined splendor. Many a deluded notion by which multitudes are misled is shown up by him in all its wretched weakness and deceit. Take, for instance, the following trenchant passage from p. 88:

We are familiar with the cry which is so intensely popular, "Give us a simple Christianity. Let us get behind the Christ of the Epistles and go to the simple Christ of the Gospels. Let us penetrate beneath the different peculiarities of varying religions, and get at the strong underlying residuum which will constitute a common Christianity, or even a universal religion." But suppose, in another sphere of our necessities, we were to seek the advice of some famous physician, and were to return armed with some medical prescription which he assured us would without fail ease our complaint and restore us to our wretched health. What would be said of our earnestness, or indeed our intelligence, if we compared this prescription with others given by other physicians for other and various maladies, and by omitting some elements which we disliked, and others which we regarded as poisonous, while we substituted some which took our fancy, we were to attempt to cure ourselves with a harmless residuum, which represented our idea of the medical basis of all cures? And so when the Great Physician says to His Church, "Go ye, therefore, and make disciples," etc.—who are we that we should presume to alter this great precept, or talk of a necessary residuum? Let us say we dislike it in itself, if we will, and fear its far-reaching claims. There is at least something intelligible in trying to ignore it; it is the height of folly to presume to better it.

We hope the clergy will buy and read this most stimulating book, and recommend it to their more intelligent laity.

The Making of a Man. By James W. Lee. Chicago and New York: Fleming H. Revell Company. Price, $1.25.

A remarkable book in every way. The author shows how, in the economy of nature, provision for man's life here and in the future world is made. Dr. Lee has a full grasp of the subject from both a scientific and a religious point of view. The contents are divided under the following heads: Bread, Power, Truth, Righteousness, Beauty, Love, Immortality. The book is a useful one to place in the hands of scientists, who will find Dr. Lee's arguments in full accord with the most recent problems and discoveries. It is a good book for the skeptic, for it is convincing in its reasoning. The clergyman and student will each profit by a careful study of Dr. Lee's work, which, avoiding mere theory and religious cant, is worthy of a place in every library.

Mr. Milo Bush and Other Worthies; Their Recollections. By Hayden Carruth. Illustrated by A. B. Frost. New York: Harper & Bros. 1899. Price, $1.

A collection of droll stories whose chief merit consists in colossal exaggerations. They are laughable enough, and for those who like this sort of thing, this is the sort of thing they will like. There is decided cleverness in the patois and peculiar English of races and persons, but an entire absence of that higher and truer wit, which is as delicate and spiritual as a perfume. They have a broad gorgeousness more powerful, possibly, for present effect, but the odor of true wit reaches farther and is more enduring.

The Awkward Age. By Henry James. New York and London: Harper & Bros. Price, $1.50.

A terribly long novel, but we can pardon length when there is something to balance it, and certainly Mr. Henry James always gives you that. The book has all that delicate touch and keen insight into character which mark the well known author. The heroine is an English girl, with rather a fast mother whose object is to keep her daughter from "knowing beans."

The young woman is, however, preternaturally sharp, and discovers a great deal about beans in all their varieties. A young fellow loves her, but on account of her great acquaintance with the vegetable in question, hesitates about marrying her. He dillies and dallies, and she goes on becoming more and more conversant with bean culture. Then comes a complication with another girl, who does not know a bean even when the bag is open, the very innocence of the spring lamb.

We will not tell any more of the story, because it is not fair to the publishers. The book is not a great picture of life, but it is a miniature, and very well painted it is, and well worth a place in your gallery.

The Christianity of St. Paul. By S. A. Alexander, Reader of the Temple Church. New York: Longmans, Green & Co. Pp. 216. Price, $1.25.

This book does not claim to be an exhaustive exposition of the theology of St. Paul, but rather to illustrate in a direct, practical, and simple way the mind of St. Paul on certain great aspects of the Christian Faith. The sermons which it contains are models of their kind. They have probably as strong an infusion of doctrine as an ordinary congregation of to-day can assimilate, and put it into its most attractive form. Their language is as clear as crystal, and expresses the preacher's meaning in the most luminous way. They are keenly alive to the great problems of modern life, and bring to their solution the chief principles of the Gospel, and the highest wisdom of the past. The range of subjects with which they deal is a wide one, and embraces many topics of living interest. We congratulate the author on the production of so attractive and valuable a volume.

The Dawn of Reason; or Mental Traits in the Lower Animals. By James Welr, Jr., Md. New York: The Macmillan Company. Price, $1.25.

"I wish to be plainly understood," says the author, "as asserting the physical basis and origin of all psychical operations whatever they may be." "Mind is a resultant of nerve action." "I think it can be safely asserted and successfully maintained that mind in the lower animals is the same in kind as that of man." Those who hold to the theory that mind comes only from mind, as life from life, are called "creationists," "wielders of the instinct club." The book, however, is not largely controversial. It consists mostly of interesting descriptions of animal intelligence.

"THE QUEEN OF THE SWAMP," is the unique title of a book of short stories by Mary Hartwell Catherwood, the sub-title being "And Other Plain Americans." The stories, which have appeared in the magazines from time to time, embody some phases of American life which have passed away, the scenes being laid in the mid-West. They are classified under Ohio, Kentucky, Indiana, and Illinois, and extend back in time to 1846. Miss Catherwood's drawing is true to life, not only to the outer life, language, and environment, but also to the inner life and heart and experience of the humanity of which she writes. [Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. Price, $1.25.]

"A CYCLE OF STORIES," by Barbara Yechton will be published this week by Mr. Thomas Whittaker. A wish has been expressed by many readers for a collection of her short stories, and twenty-one will be included in the new book. The style of binding and size of book will be uniform with "Derrick," and "A Lovable Crank."

Periodicals

The Fortnightly Review for September contains as its leading article, "The Philosophy of the Dreyfus Case," by Andre Godferneux, in which the opposing political and social ideas underlying this cause celebre are forcibly described. "A New Caroline Commonplace Book" is good reading for literary critics, and so is the article on M. Brunetiere. One of the best papers in this number is that on "King Alfred's Country," by the Rev. Mr. Greswell. It enables us to trace the outlines of the ancient Arthurian kingdom which had descended to the Saxon Alfred, and to the limits of which his dominions had been reduced by the invading Danes before he arose to be their conqueror, and to make for himself for all time the honored name of "Alfred the Great."

The Nineteenth Century for September is a strong number. South African affairs are ably discussed by Sir Sidney Shippard, K.C.M.G. "An Indian Plague Story," by Cornelia Sorabji, is fascinating, but horrible. The grand debate des grandes Dames over the Women's Congress is continued with unabated vigor; and zeal enough to raise and educate a large family has already been expended upon the subject. Miss Elizabeth L. Banks' article on "The American Negro and His Place," will attract wide attention; according to Miss Banks' frank statements, his place is a very small one, not much more in evidence than are "snakes in Ireland."

Church Music

New issues from the house of Novello, Ewer & Co., New York, this week, are received as follows: A service of sterling character for the Holy Communion, by C. Steggall, in A, being No. 39, the latest in the series of Short Settings, with inclusion of Benedictus and Agnus Dei, and one which is in every way worthy of fellowship in the valued list of works preceding. (Price, 50 cents.) A recent composition to Te Deum, in F, by J. Edward German, is extended and grandiose (22 pp., with an added pedal staff); it contains many repetitions, and is properly adapted only to "solemn" use, and then by a choir of uncommon training and resources. (40 cents.)

In the Novello "Short Anthems" series, we find a setting to "Mercy and Truth are met together," adapted and arranged from the music of the Russian Church by Arthur Sullivan. (6 cents.) Six easy full anthems, by that very Churchly writer, Frederick Iliffe, suitable to any fair parish choir: "Fret not thyself because of the ungodly," "I look for the Lord," "Lord, I call upon Thee," "My song shall be of mercy and judgment," "O worship the Lord in the beauty of holiness," "The Lord is King, He sitteth between the cherubims" (each 6 cents). Mr. Iliffe is well noted in his compositions for ecclesiastical vigor and musical correctness, and these short anthems named are very fitting for introits before Celebration, being also suitably short. In similar listing and character we might place "The Sacrifice of God," by Herbert W. Wareing. (Musical Times, 6 cents.) There is rich musical thought, with sympathetic expression and brilliancy of tone color and contrast, in the morning and evening services, by S. Coleridge-Taylor, in F, Te Deum, Benedictus, and Jubilate, Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis,—three numbers (15 cents each). These would well suit as reserves for the great feasts, in competent choirs only. Simpler and more generally useful services will be found in a Te Deum in the key of A flat, by Stainer (general chant form), and a unison Te Deum in E flat, by E. W. Naylor (12 cents).

CHURCH LIFE CO., DIXON, ILL.

THE DISTINGUISHING CHARACTERISTIC OF THE VOCALION IS ITS EXQUISITE TONE

ORGANS BUILT on the Vocalion system are pre-eminently fitted for church services. They have a full, rich, diapason tone and a peculiar delicacy in the string registers, which make them of inestimable value as an accompaniment to the human voice.

The method of tone production is radically different from all others. It gives the pitch as a fixed quality, free reeds being used for the purpose. In connection with each reed there is a pipe or chamber through which the tone passes and which determines its quality. By this means the reed is given a smooth, fluty quality of tone as well as resonance and remarkable power.

The distinctive features of the Vocalion are

Tonal superiority;
Compactness of form in proportion to capacity.
Variety of registration;
And price.

We wish to call the attention of all church societies contemplating the purchase of an organ to our Style 22, a full description of which we shall be glad to furnish upon application. Send for Catalogue G.

Vocalions range in price from $275 upward.

Opinions of the Press

The Baltimore American
SPIRITUALISM INVESTIGATED.—Professor Hyslop will not be able, in all probability, to add anything of note to his rubbish, and scientists will be astounded that an intelligent professor can be so deluded as to offer it as scientific testimony, much less proof. Proof may yet be offered of the immortality of the soul, but it will be in accord with scientific principles, and not the eccentricities of mind transference, the ravings of hysteria, or the ingenious trickery of adventurers. The indestructibility of matter will probably be the starting point of such effort. If no atom of matter is or can be destroyed, then all the atoms in a human being ought to come together again at some remote period in the future, and the human being be rehabilitated. This may be the solution of the problem, but meanwhile revelation tells all that it is necessary to know about the matter. Further knowledge may have been wisely concealed. Progress in this world is undoubtedly part of God's economy, and, were the delights of a future world to be specifically revealed, men might lose all interest in the present, and thus arrest the wheels of progress. Such things have actually occurred on a limited scale, and it is not desirable that they should be repeated.

The Standard (Baptist)
SIGNS OF THE TIMES—Along with the threatening perils that confront us, no one can fail to see that there are real forces at work for the bettering of the conditions of the people in classes and masses. The Postoffice, the public school, and various other activities of a similar nature, have surely wrought no harm. Personally I write as one who is not a confirmed believer in the declaration that men primarily are made better men by improving their surroundings. To transfer a man from a hovel to a palace does not of necessity transform him from a sinner to a saint. To enable a man to ride at a speed of seventy miles an hour instead of riding in a slow coach at a speed of six, is not of necessity to send him forward in the right direction. To lift a man is not always to elevate him. The best stepping stones may be dead selves. But when all these things have been said, there can be no doubt of the power of incentive which comes with the improved conditions. Prevention of crime is better than punishment. Restriction of disease is better than cure. And many a stream is issuing from the sanctuary, and from other places as well, to day, which is bound to be for the blessing of the people. Institutional churches, social and college settlements, a new and renewed Incarnation, have too well proved their right to be, under certain conditions, to be laughed to scorn. They are a part of the real force which is moving the people to-day to a perception of the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man. Problems? Yes. Perils? Yes, and many of them. But they that be for us are more than they that be against us. Good not unmixed with evil, and evil not devoid of good, lie all about us. After all has been said, what is the "work" to which we are called? What is the "field" which with platitudinous frequency we are told lies on every side, white for the harvest? What is the Christian Church for? Why are we in it? Decay and rust are certainly not the best conditions, and ease from lack of problems is not the best state even for Zion. Hope and faith and courage are not qualities required when there is nothing to be done.

"From the lowest soldier to the highest officer, from the servant to the master, there is not a character in any of Captain King's novels that is not wholly in keeping with expressed sentiments. The Household

The White Cross on the Red Altar

BY THE REV. EDWARD A. RAND

A WHITE cross on a red draped altar. St. Ann's parish could not afford a cross of brass. This was only a symbol of wood painted white. It was the work of poverty. The red flannel draping the altar was shabby. It was expected to last all the year through, through Advent, Christmas, Epiphany, all the seasons, the same old red flannel. This, too, was poverty's offering.

Before the altar was a kneeling figure, that of the rector of St. Ann's. His cassock was shabby, but his hair was white and long and lovely.

Everybody called him "Father Preston," Methodist Episcopalians as well as Protestant Episcopalians, Congregationalists, Baptists; and every Roman Catholic saluted him with a special bow, and also said, "Father Preston."

"How the wind does roar!" thought the kneeling old man. "I hear the rafters overhead, out in the nave of the church, creak. It makes me think of a ship, and nave comes from navis, ship, doesn't it? The church is the precious ark, and who will come to the ark of the Church this morning?"

"Boom, boom!" roared the wind. "No one will come, boom, boom! No one will come?"

That is what Mary Dennison said—"Mary D." people called her. Mary D. was Father Preston's housekeeper. He had neither wife nor daughter living. There was a son, Henry. And where was he? A prodigal in a great city, he had, while intoxicated, shipped on board of a vessel bound for the South of Africa.

Off on the great deep somewhere that wild morning, the rector's only descendant upon the earth might be supposed to be. But Mary D., what had she said that day? "Nobody will go to the church—stay at home, I beg ye!"

"I, the rector of St. Ann's, staying at home? Why, I go by Warden Jones', and I pass the house of Arnold Bixby; he is a vestryman, and his daughter Ann is the parish clerk. I must set them an example."

"I warrant ye Father Preston, every one of them will be settin' in their comfortable chairs as near their stoves as possible, and they won't go near their windows to see who is passing."

"Oh no, Mary, oh no! I surely must set an example. Then I must set the new janitor an example."

"And who is that, Father Preston?"

"Samuel Sylvester."

"Samuel Sylvester! What, that sleepy-lookin' chap? Why, Father Preston, he's too lazy to try to breathe out in this roarin' wind. I never knew him do anything wuth remembrin' except takin' our Henry down from a pear tree when he was stuck up in the limbs—Oh, oh scuse me!" Henry, the prodigal, was a subject never voluntarily taken up as a rule. It was a buried subject, and no one ever noticed the stone above the grave unless they stumbled upon it. Father Preston laid his hand upon his heart as if to stop a pain shooting through it.

"I—I must go," he said. "The sexton's first morning at the church he must find me there."

Out into the uproar went the rector. The storm scolded him for coming. It brushed its heavy wings against him as if trying to overthrow him for his audacity. He staggered by the homes of warden, parish clerk, and vestryman, his soul amid the chilling storm feeling a delightful warmth because he was setting a good example. Nobody followed it. "I shall find the church open and a fire kindled, and it will seem like a house of refuge," thought the rector.

Through the storm a warm wave seemed to swell from the doors of St. Ann's out as far as his chilled face, and gently stroked it. Within was the warmth of the consciousness of a good example, and without was the summer air blown from the opened doors of St. Ann's. When he reached those doors they were closed! They were locked! Recovering from his surprise, he said gently, "I am glad I have a key." He opened the house.

Empty!

The big old-fashioned wood stove in one corner was cold as the sea roaring half a mile away. "Cold!" he murmured, "I must start the fire myself."

Somebody that week had wanted to reach the supposed "sexton of St. Ann's," having lost a pair of spectacles either in the church or during a ride of five miles to the church. The note had been deposited in the rector's box at the postoffice as the surest way of reaching an unknown official of the parish.

"Hit the nail on the head—squares!" said Mary. "That's what half of them rectors are, sextons."

Father Preston built a fire and warmed up the stove, and knew that in the process of time—no one could say just when—it would do something toward warming up the church.

Suddenly the rector heard a soft noise behind him. He turned, and there was the new sexton, Sam Sylvester, with his two small, sleepy eyes under two shaggy eyebrows. "Sam," the people said. It was only the rector who thought as sexton he should enjoy his title in full, Samuel.

"Wall," drawled Sam in his sleepy way, I didn't git here, for I thought ye wouldn't come. Somebody comin' down the road said smoke was comin' out of the chimbley, and I thought it might be that suthin had got on fire, and I'd better come up and look arter it."

"Something did get on fire. Some wood I put in the stove," said the rector, with dignity. He wanted to say more, but he deemed it best to feel an emotion and stay its expression.

"Wall," exclaimed Sam, and he stared helplessly. How the storm did roar, and the roof-timbers creaked, and the nave seemed more than ever like a ship out at sea, straining to get through a tempest. The rector was glad to have his thoughts diverted from the new sexton.

What next?

No one of the congregation came. Would there be any service? The rector had expected to use that morning for the first time a fald-stool that a Church friend had sent him.

"St. Ann's needs waking up," said the friend. "Everything is getting old; I will send something new. I will send a fald-stool."

The rector had hoped for fair weather and a congregation of size. If there had been in the anticipation a little feeling like vanity, it all went to its cross.

"Well, Samuel," said the rector, "we want some kind of service. We want to honor God. That is what churches are for, and there are enough here to claim a blessing. We will take the litany. You can kneel anywhere in the pews." The rector moved toward the fald-stool.

"Take what, sir?" asked Sam, who was an outsider in his Church affinities, and the rector had forgotten it for the moment.

"The litany—oh, I see! There it is, that page. I take one sentence and you respond, saying the next."

"Don't we want to light up? It's kinder darkish here. This storm is like night time."

"Well, it might be a good idea, a lamp or two. I dare say you can see better, you wear glasses." The rector prided himself on his ability to see without glasses, and then he had been saying the litany for many years. The sexton kindled two smoky kerosene lamps.

The rector began, "O God the Father of heaven, have mercy upon us miserable sinners."

The sexton responded accurately.

"What a deep bass voice he has," thought the rector approvingly. "I must train him. He only needs training to be a valuable help in service time."

The rector went on and his tones were more hopeful and courageous. Really, it was worth his while to brave the tempest and come to church. He could, in imagination hear the sexton heading the feeble column of responses with his stout voice. How appropriate that name Samuel! Good old Bible name as ever was. Yes, it paid to come to church. The rector proceeded.

The sexton responded.

Soon, though, the responses became feebler. As the rector could not look under that reverently bowed head, he could not solve this mystery.

Finally Sam was silent altogether, and Father Preston heard a heavy breathing. The rector raised his voice, "From lightning and tempest—." The storm overhead alone responded.

The sexton was fast asleep! To think that the fald-stool designed to wake up old St. Ann's should be the occasion for a nap! What would Mary D. say if here? Hadn't she applied the words "sleepy-lookin' chap" to Sam.

The rector reached over to him, gently shook him, and called him by that good old Bible name, "Samuel!"

"Ugh—ugh!" groaned the sexton, "I—I lost my place."

"There it is! Now we will go on."

"From lightning and tempest!" sounded the clear, reverent tones of Father Preston. Suddenly there was an interruption. There came the heavy sound of a fall, out near the stove.

Up through the fields sloping back from the sea, a rough figure had been slowly making his way. From a wreck, he had been swept ashore by a billow, and was tired out. He kept on, though, irregularly, like a ship beating its way against a head wind. He made out a faint light in the dreary dusk as from an illumined window. He saw a building. He crept along its walls. He turned a corner. He threw himself against a door, staggered across the entry, and fell heavily upon the floor near the stove. The rector looked up in alarm. "From lightning and tempest!" Had the wind forced its way into the building? How could it happen at that corner, which was strong? Sam was not given to argument. He had "jest an idee" that "suthin had happened out by the stove," and as "saxton," he, rather than the rector ought to look into it, and for Sam Sylvester's legs, they moved with unusual celerity.

When the rector reached the space about the stove, he saw the sexton on the floor, a head was resting on his lap, and he was tenderly stroking a white brow. "Wall, Father Preston, you've got one soul out to church. This is the boy I used to play with, and I knew him like a book. This is your Henry. He'll come to in a moment and be all right—and—here comes—why—hullo!"

"Yes, we've come—for we saw the rector go by," said a voice. Warden Jones was speaking, and behind him were Arnold Bixby and his daughter.

"Thank God!" the rector was murmuring. "My boy has got home. We will finish the litany and—say from the heart the General Thanksgiving, and add a special one."

At first the warden and his companions did not understand, and thought the thanks must be for their safe arrival.

GOOD TEETH.

Why Some Persons Are Enabled to Keep Them Until Old Age.

Think a moment, and you will remember that we build every part of the body, teeth and bones included, from what we eat.

Therefore, when any parts show decay (teeth, for instance) before the proper time, there is evidence of lack of the certain elements in the food that keep them renewed each day, or possibly there has been misuse.

Certain field grains contain the delicate particles of Phosphate of Lime needed for bone and teeth building. Nature will not readily use it if administered as a drug, but quickly accepts it when furnished in the condition it is found in the grains; i. e., direct from Nature's own laboratory. It is thus furnished in the breakfast food known as Grape-Nuts, and one may depend that the regular use of this food will insure the introduction into the body of such bone and teeth material as will hinder decay and add greatly to the appearance and comfort of the user.

Are Grape-Nuts good?

Once tried, you will never forget the delicate sweet of the grape-sugar and their crisp deliciousness.

All good grocers sell Grape-Nuts.

"I don't see," said the old man, "why chopping wood isn't just about as good exercise, and just as enjoyable, as playing golf." "It is the walking between strokes that makes golf so valuable as exercise," explained the boy. "That equalizes matters and gives the legs the exercise that they need." Thus it happened that the old man went out into the yard and placed sticks of wood at intervals all around it, after which he handed the boy an axe and told him to play the full course.—Chicago Evening Post.

Greenland has a Newspaper

JOHN MOELLER can claim to be the pioneer journalist of Greenland, according to a letter received from a relative in London. Not only is he the pioneer, but he is still the only newspaper publisher in the land of ice and mystery. He will probably have more difficulties to overcome than any other newspaper publisher of this century, for he had first to educate his readers.

The paper began its existence at Godthab, and Moeller, single-handed, performed the functions of reporter, copy-reader, editor, compositor, printer, and distributor. He issued it twice a month, and at first it contained nothing more than a collection of crude drawings. Gradually words were introduced, and then sentences. Finally, regular articles concerning the affairs of the day began to appear, and the painstaking editor began to reap some return for his laborious efforts.

He had taught his subscribers how to read, and they appreciated it, and continued to take his paper. There is no record that any of them ever objected to any of Mr. Moeller's editorials, or visited the sanctum with a desire to chastise the editor. Having no rivals, Mr. Moeller did not fear that any of his clientele would withdraw their patronage in favor of some other paper. It was "Hobson's choice" for the subscribers, or, rather Moeller's choice.

The press used by Moeller is one of the old-fashioned Washington hand presses. But one page can be printed at a time, and the type has to be inked by hand after each impression. This, however, does not bother Mr. Moeller very much, as his paper rarely contains more than one page.

Once printed, the paper must be distributed among the subscribers, and as there are no mail trains in Greenland, or trains of any sort, Mr. Moeller straps on his skates and proceeds to distribute the paper himself. He makes great speed over the ice, and soon has the entire circulation run out, though to reach his most distant subscriber he must skate at least one hundred miles.

"SO you were at Santiago?" we said to the young trooper whom we met at the close of a Christian Endeavor service. "Yes," was his answer, "and I only wish there were some way I could tell everybody what we boys owed to General Wood and Colonel Roosevelt. During the hottest of the fight I fell exhausted, but by good luck Colonel Roosevelt was coming that way. He got off his horse and kindly asked if he could do anything for me—one of the boys of another regiment. I told him that I supposed I was only overcome by heat and fatigue, and would be all right in a few moments. He unswung his canteen and said: 'I hope you don't want whiskey, my man; because I haven't got any, but here is some coffee that will do you good.' He not only insisted upon my drinking from his canteen, but he poured half of what was left in mine; helped me into his own saddle, and carried me to a place of rest and safety. And I've seen Wood do more than that for a child. The day after the surrender I saw the General pick up a little Cuban not more than seven years old, who had tried to reach our camp to get something to eat, and had fallen by the way from sheer weakness. I saw Wood gather that little Cuban bundle of bones and carry him to headquarters, and nurse him better than his own mother would. And when we marched into Santiago if there wasn't that little chap, with nothing on but a pocket handkerchief, holding something in his hand closely wrapped up in an old rag he had found somewhere. He caught the General's eye and succeeded in presenting his gift to him. It proved to be a little yellow chicken about a week old. Wood sent it back to America, I was told, and I hope it is alive yet. But I warrant he thinks more of it than of any military honors he has won." And what the corporal told to us we thought worth telling to all our readers.—The Interior.

M. LEONARD invited a gentleman to play a game of dominoes with one of his dogs. The younger and slighter dog seated himself on a chair at the table, and the writer and M. Leonard seated themselves opposite. Six dominoes were placed on their edges in the usual manner before the dog, a like number before the writer. The dog, having a double number, took one up in his mouth and put it on the middle of the table; the writer placed a corresponding piece on one side; the dog immediately played another correctly, and soon until all the pieces were engaged. Other six dominoes were then given to each, and the writer immediately played a wrong number. The dog looked surprised, stared very earnestly at the writer, growled, and finally barked angrily. Finding that no notice was taken of his remonstrances, he pushed away the wrong domino with his nose, and took up a suitable one from his own pieces and played it in its stead. The writer then played correctly; the dog followed, and won the game. Not the slightest intimation could have been given by M. Leonard to the dog. This mode of play must have been entirely the result of his own observation and judgment. It should be added that the performance was strictly private. The owner of the dogs was a man of independent fortune, and the instruction of the dogs had been taken up merely as a curious and amusing investigation.—Cassell's Natural History.

A LITTLE fresh-air walf was spending his first day in the country. When the cows came up in the evening to be milked, he went down to the barnyard with his host to see the operation. The cows were standing about placidly, and as is their custom at that time of day, were contentedly chewing the cud. The boy watched the milkmaids at work, and his eyes dwelt with growing wonder on the ceaseless grind of the cows' jaws. At length he turned to his host and said: "Do you have to buy gum for all them cows?"

The Heart of a Boy

BY MARGARET DOORIS

Not yours for the asking, but I have been taught
The heart of a boy can never be bought.
And yet, I am sure, I never knew one
But in some way or other had to be won.
Full of mischief and frolic, and shy as a dove,
The heart of a boy must have love for love.
A gift will help on, if you give it a thought—
If you are a man, the battles you've fought
May be to d o'er and o'er with spirit and dash,
If you add now and then a little hard cash;
A drum has much virtue, and so has a top,
There is always a charm about corn that will pop.
Marbles, of course, and kites that will fly,
Toy-cannons and rockets on Fourth of July;
Fire-crackers are always dear to the boys—
In fact, anything with a good deal of noise.
It is needless to say that a big ball of twine
Will go a long way; and a fish-hook and line,
And a handsome new rod just ready to bait,
For the heart of a boy no longer you'll wait.
To make it secure to the end of your life,
Give him a gun and a five-bladed knife.

If you are a woman, it is well worth your while
To bestow on the boy more things than a smile.
And do not forget, on the days that you bake,
To ask him around for a piece of the cake.
Turnovers and pies will not come amiss,
Cookies and crullers will each bring a kiss.
Add peaches and cream, and ices thrown in,
And truly the heart of the boy you will win.
In the years still to be, when asked for a toast
On the good things of life, of your cooking he'll be ast.

The past will come back, he will think of your face,
And the goodies you gave, the banquet will grace.
Win the heart of a boy whenever you can,
And it will be yours when he is a man.

The Arbutus

BY ALICE MAY DOUGLAS

"ISN'T she a beauty, Albert, now isn't she?"

"She couldn't be finer, Bertram, and tomorrow she slides into the water. May day is just the time for launching the 'Arbutus.'"

The two brothers looked with pride at a row boat to which they were putting the finishing touches. They were scarcely more than boys, yet they had built the boat themselves. No one else had had the least part in her construction. The craft was painted white with pink trimmings, and the name at the stern was also in pink. The boys were justly proud of their work.

May day dawned bright. But the young people had planned for no picnic to the grove. Instead they had all gathered to witness the launch of the "Arbutus." The craft stood near the edge of the river, and was decorated with flags. On all sides were groups of Mayers, discussing this unique May party, and complimenting the builders upon their success. Many had baskets filled with treasures from the wood, for they had brought all the beauty of the woodland for this riverside festivity.

"She launches in just five minutes," said Albert, looking at his watch, "so be on hand, boys, to lend a hand; but you girls who wish to decorate the 'Arbutus' can do so now."

"All right," cried the girls cheerily, beginning to throw into the craft beautiful May pinks and bits of evergreen.

"She's surely well loaded," cried Bertram, with great satisfaction. "Now boys!"

A dozen pair of hands were instantly upon the boat, and with a great shout, and midst the cheering and the waving of handkerchiefs by the spectators, the boat was pushed into the water. As soon as she was afloat, Albert jumped into her, picked up his oars, and rowed out a short distance, those on shore meanwhile pelting him with May flowers, some of which missed their mark, and were eagerly seized by the waves.

The brothers took turns in giving their guests a trial trip upon the "Arbutus", taking eight at a time. This over, the boat was made fast, and all partook of their lunches, being seated at rustic tables arranged for the occasion. Next came games and a general good time.

While they were in the midst of their merry making, one of the girls exclaimed: "Here comes Mr. Holt; poor old man, he's still looking for his dory that drifted off to sea two months ago."

A fisherman drew near. His form was bent with the burdens of many years, and his white hair was in strange contrast with his face, which had been browned by the New England sea breeze.

"Have any of you seen her?" he inquired in an anxious tone. "I didn't know but the tide might bring her back up the river."

"We are half a mile from the mouth of the river," said Bertram in a kindly tone. "Do you not think she would be more likely to be washed upon the sea coast than back up the river?"

"P'raps so, but I miss her so, boy, I can't help going to look after her at every high tide. Now the children have all married and left, and marm has gone to another world, she was all there was left to me. I sot a heap by her, I did. Then she brought in my living, too. The only way I've had for years for bringing in a penny is to dig clams, and the only way of getting the clams is to have a boat so's to go to the flats where they are. Everyone has been so kind to me since the storm broke the painter to my dory, and she drifted out to sea, but I can't expect 'em to feed me always. I must e my own man, and then I can't live without a boat, I like one so."

"You'd better get Albert and Bertram to build you one," exclaimed one of the group. "See, they made this. It is a pleasure boat, and isn't it fine!"

"Yes, yes," acquiesced the old man, shading his eyes from the bright sun to look upon the "Arbutus". "A pleasure boat," he repeated. "Well, I combine pleasure and business in mine, and I wish I had one. I wish I had one." The tears came to the speaker's eyes.

"We'd make you one, if you'd like one," offered Albert, "wouldn't we, Bertram?"

"Of course we would. We had such a good time building this, that we had just as soon repeat the experience as not."

"It is ever so good of you to make such an offer," said Mr. Holt, "but it would take you a long time, and I want my boat right off. How can I live another week without going clamming?" Why, I've been clamming all my life."

The proprietors of the "Arbutus" now drew aside for a confidential talk. Bits of their conversation could occasionally be heard by the others. They were like this: "Can we do it?" "Ought we to do it?" "What is our pleasure compared to his?" "We have a hundred ways in which to look for enjoyment; he but one."

They soon returned to the company with bright looks. Albert, going up to Mr. Holt said: "My brother and I have decided to make you a present of our boat. We have already got our share of enjoyment by building her. It is but fair that some one else should get from her all future pleasure. We should doubtless soon tire of her, and you are very, very welcome to the 'Arbutus'."

"Three cheers for Albert and Bertram," cried Harry Burns.

The cheers were so hearty that no one could hear what Mr. Holt had to say, so he was asked to repeat.

"I was a saying that it is too much, boys, too much. I can't take your boat. I just can't. 'Twould be a shame to spoil such a pretty thing, for digging clams and bringing them home is dirty work. God is good and He will send me another dory, if my own has run away from home."

"How do you know but that God sent you this?" asked Bertram.

"The old man's face brightened. "He did, He did, and what am I doing, refusing to accept what the good God sends me. Thank you, boys, thank you a hundred times for the boat, and when you get as old and poor as I am, may the Lord send you such friends as you have been to me."

"Three cheers for Mr. Holt and for the new dory," cried Harry.

The cheers were louder than ever, and he who had inspired them took off his hat, as weather beaten as himself, and acknowledged them. He then stepped into the "Arbutus" and rowed away.

A year has passed. The little craft which the brothers builded is a sorry looking remnant of her former beautiful self, but she has been to her doting owner the greatest joy of his life. She has brought back from the flats more clams that has any of the other craft, and for this year's May day is to bring the largest load yet attempted, for when the young people gather at the river to attend the launching of the brothers' "Arbutus" number two, Mr. Holt is to surprise them with a clam bake.

"DON'T you bother your head about fame, Pat. It rarely comes to any of us till after we are dead."

"Faix, an' o'im willin' to shtay here and wait for it."

Children in Japan

BEFORE nearly every house in Japan stands an immense mast, taller than the roof, and on it float huge fishes, red or green, made of cloth, which the wind fills out so that they are quite life-like. These fishes indicate the number of boys in each family—a son to each fish. The Japanese are great fishermen and fish fanciers, and the carp, which always swims up stream, is much admired by them for its courage and perseverance. It has, therefore, become the emblem of the boys. But, when there are only girls in the family, nothing is put upon the mast—they do not count at all!

Since we are speaking of fishes, let me tell you that the Japanese children eat a great deal of fish, and eat it entirely raw, too. The fishes are kept alive in the kitchen, either in sea water or river water, and, when meal-time comes, they are cut up into small pieces and eaten without salt, pepper, or seasoning of any kind. In Japan, knives and forks are unknown; so two little sticks, called chop-sticks, are used to eat the fish. At first thought, the idea of eating raw fish is unpleasant; but do we not eat oysters and clams raw, in America, sometimes?

There are many toys made in Japan for the children. All the games known here are to be found there, and many others besides. In Tokyo, the capital, there is one quarter of the city, consisting of three or four streets, in whose bazars nothing is sold but children's toys. Christmas and New Year are unknown as holidays, but once each year there is a great children's festival. On that day the bazar quarter is beautifully illuminated; the toy-shops are filled with pretty things, and the children gather there and are laden down by their parents with all the toys that their arms can carry.

Japanese boys are extremely brave and patriotic; they love their country with all their heart, and would willingly give their lives to defend it. When the late war between Japan and China was raging, all the boys of fifteen and sixteen who thought themselves strong enough to carry a gun and fight, offered to enlist. Their services, however, were not needed, as Japan already had an army larger than was necessary to vanquish the Chinese. There are in Japan several military schools and a great naval academy, where young men are prepared to become officers in the army or navy. —Pleasant Hours.

Finance and Commerce

THE last bank statement in New York was more favorable in so far as there was an increase in legal reserves, but it was brought about by a sharp calling of loans, which also reduced materially the total of deposits. The stock market rallied a little from the extreme break, but has since turned rather dull, with the outside less disposed to operate. On the other hand, a more decided firmness has set into wheat, corn, provisions, and cotton.

In wheat, the strength is almost purely speculative and to a degree sentimental. There is nothing in the supply and demand at the moment to induce higher prices. Stocks everywhere are liberal, and the world's visible is increasing. On the whole, shipping demand in American markets is poor, and the world's weekly shipments to the importing countries of Europe are fully equal to their requirements. In a speculative way, however, the feeling is strong. Many of the best informed traders have confidence in the future price of wheat, because they think the last winter wheat crop the greatest failure on record, which must in time be felt, and they also regard the good estimate on the spring wheat crop, on which Europe is pinning its faith, as too high.

Then again, the great mass of small traders believe that as business generally has had a boom, and nearly all commodities have advanced in prices, that the boom is due to strike the great farm staples, and on this theory most traders are bullish. The visible supply of wheat is liberal, and in the ordinary course of trade will likely continue to increase for a month or six weeks longer. The stock appears to be well held, however, and for several weeks the pressure from long wheat has been slight. In the absence of any conspicuous buying during that time, the report has gained favor that very strong New York capitalists are large owners of the property. Nothing definite seems to be known by the trade concerning it yet.

The strength in corn has been on small stocks, good demand, and the generally reactionary feeling accompanying a modification of crop estimates. The corn crop is a big one, but not a record-breaker, and the reserves of old corn are small.

In provisions, while the demand is hardly up to last year, it is a large demand, and the opinion is gaining that the number of young hogs in the country was much reduced by the cold weather of last winter and spring.

There is no change in the general business situation. About the only thing of which complaint is heard, is that there is not enough currency to do the business, particularly of small bills.

Prices continue firm for iron, wool, cotton goods, etc., and bank clearings are 25 per cent. above last year.

African Commerce

COMMERCIAL Africa in 1899 is the title of a publication just prepared by the Treasury Bureau of Statistics. It shows present commercial conditions in Africa, and incidentally the political divisions as they now exist, and is accompanied by a map showing the boundary lines of the various colonies, protectorates, spheres of influence, and independent States of this great continent, whose map has so rapidly changed during the past few years. A table accompanying the monograph shows the imports and exports into and from each of the divisions. The imports amount in round numbers to $400,000,000, and the exports to $350,000,000, while of the imports, $18,000,000 is furnished by the United States, and of the exports, $10,000,000 is sent to the United States.

Of course the large proportion of the commercial business of Africa is transacted through the British colonies, their share being $131,000,000 of the imports, and $132,000,000 of the exports. Next in importance in the import and export trade is the South African Republic, or Transvaal, which is attracting so much a tention at the present moment, its imports amounting to $104,000,000, and its exports $54,000,000, the chief exports being gold and other minerals. French Africa imports goods valued at over 70 million dollars, and exports nearly an equal quantity; Turkish Africa, principally Egypt, imports 54 million dollars, and exports 62 million dollars, while Portuguese Africa, whose ports on the eastern coast are adjacent to the gold and diamond fields, is also the scene of commercial activity, the importations being twelve million dollars, and the exportations nearly seven million dollars.

Much additional information has recently been brought to the surface regarding Africa through the opportunities which are now offered for access to the interior. Physically the African continent is in many respects unique. Five thousand miles in extreme length, and over 4,000 in breadth, its area is greater than that of any other continent except Asia, the latest estimates being 11,874,000 square miles. Its coast formation is peculiar in the absence of deep indentations, bays, or harbors, and the small number of waterways which offer entrance to the interior. The fact that the greater part of the interior is an elevated table land extending on all sides to within a short distance of the coast, renders access to the interior by the few large streams, difficult. At the point where the rivers pass from the elevated plateau of the interior to the lowland of the coast, the falls or rapids which there exist prevent navigation, and as a result, travel to the interior of Africa by water developed more slowly than in any other continent. Indeed it was not until the explorations of Livingston, Stanley, Speke, and others developed the true conditions, and made known the fact that vast navigable water stretches were to be found in the interior, that it occurred to man to transport steam vessels around those falls and put them afloat in the waterways of the interior. When those conditions were clearly established, however, modern ingenuity and energy soon found a means of transporting steamers in small pieces upon the backs of men through the forests, around the falls and rapids, for scores and even hundreds of miles, and putting them together, set afloat the steamers which penetrate thousands of miles into the interior, and develop facts never before known, and which could not have been developed by land exploration in tropical climates and jungles for many generations.

Hints to Housekeepers

[T was formerly thought that an egg must be safe eating whatever the surroundings, since its shell covered completely the part eaten; but it has now been shown unmistakably that germs of disease can even find their way through an egg-shell. For instance, the typhus bacillus and the cholera bacillus have both been found to make their way through an unbroken egg-shell in about sixteen hours, and locate themselves in the nutrient contents. This is a clear indication, therefore, that the greatest care should be exercised in the storage and handling of eggs, since they may thus be made vehicles for most deadly poisons. Doubtless the immunity from such evil which we enjoy in our use of eggs as food, is due to the fact that we generally cook them in high temperature before we eat them, and thus deal death to the germs and safety to ourselves. But this is not always the case, nor is it always sufficient, and now that the importation of eggs has increased to such an enormous extent, it would be well could we insist upon sanitary measures in the country of export. The packing of eggs is of great importance, and the substance used should be clean and pure, for did it come from a centre of infection and be contaminated, we could hardly hope that in such close contact with the shells some germs might not pass through into the tempting land of plenty within, with dire results to the consumers. Therefore the moral of it all is that we should, if possible, satisfy ourselves as to the source and nature of our egg supply, or failing that, invariably cook all eggs partaken of.

KEEPING GRAPES.—Grapes keep more easily than apples. Of course all varieties of grapes will not keep, any more than all varieties of apples. Grapes for keeping must have a firm, tough skin, though not necessarily thick. The kinds produced in this locality that are good keepers are Catawbas, Isabellas, Dianas, Ionas, and Vergennes. After kind or variety comes maturity; an unripe grape will not keep. The acid will eat up the skin, and decay will follow. So be sure that the fruit is ripe and full of sugar. A Catawba that is thoroughly ripe will be almost as dark in color as an Isabella, and it will have flavor and will keep. When picked, handle as little as possible, so as not to destroy the bloom. Place in a common picking tray or box of convenient size, a layer of clusters upon a layer of leaves; or if leaves are not available, use paper; then on this layer another paper, and then another layer of fruit, till you have three layers deep. Next, keep as cold as possible, till cold, freezing weather. Do not be afraid of frost, for grapes will endure a degree of cold that is surprising. A good place is a wood house or barn, or any cool place where mice will not get at them. At the approach of real winter, place in the cellar, but the coldest part of the cellar. If cellar is damp, place near the ceiling, but if cellar is dry, place near the ground, for if kept too dry the grapes will wither, and if too damp they will mould.—Correspondence Country Gentleman.

A Weekly Record of the News, the Work, and the Thought of the Church

Vanquished Trema

BY ROBERT MCKAY

Down by the font, love,
Near St. Gabriel's portal,
You and I were dowered, lov
With the life immortal.
I was a babe o' the farm-lands,
And you in the city born;
You with the odor of violets,
And I with the scent of corn.

Down by the font, love,
In the mystic water,
You and I were made, love,
God's own son and daughter.
And I was born to a cabin
Of logs by a lonely stream,
You to a mansion of splendor,
Where life was a beautiful dream.

Down by the font, love,
With a strange emotion,
Have I dreamed of ships, love,
Passing on the ocean;
Passing and parting forever,
And lost in an hour to sight;
One to the bright west sailing,
And one to the shades of night.

Down by the font, love,
The story of life began.
You sped to womanhood, love,
And I to the stature of man;
Yours were the flowers and sunshine,
(God double them over and o'er!)
Mine the rough paths of labor
And the raven's refrain, Nevermore.

Down by the font, love,
Seeds of strength were given
Which have grown to fruit, love,
That is sweet as heaven.
Vanquish'd the dreams of my folly,
I live as a country born;
Yours be the odor of violets,
But mine be the scent of corn

Notes of the World's Progress

ACCORDING TO ENTERPRISING correspondents, the Transvaal is in a condition of "feverish activity." The situation is in reality no more serious than two weeks ago, although "hurried preparations" have brought matters nearer a dangerous focus. At this writing the Boer Republic is much in the position of the small boy with a chip on his shoulder. Neither Great Britain nor the Boer Republic seems desirous of taking the first step. Assurances have been given the Boers by the Orange Free State that in the event of England assuming the aggressive, South Africa will present a united front to British invasion. It is stated that President McKinley declined to intervene by offering arbitration, but this report is not confirmed. Holland is moving to prevent a conflict, and is endeavoring to enlist the aid of Germany in accomplishing this purpose. Reports emanating from the Transvaal must not be relied upon implicitly, as the authorities are maintaining a censorship, and will allow nothing to go out unfavorable to themselves.

CHICAGO'S FALL FESTIVAL CAME near falling, but although bent, it is not broken, and the city is taking on a holiday appearance. October 9, 1871, a cow owned by a worthy woman named O'Leary, balked at the milking operation and kicked over a lamp, thus starting a conflagration which consumed all but a fragment of the city. The Chicago of 1871 is hardly recognizable as the Chicago of to-day, and so it is that civic pride sets aside Oct. 9th as Chicago Day, a time for fittingly celebrating the rise from ashes to greatness of this Western Phoenix. The arrangements this year were in their incipency handled injudiciously, and serious labor complications threatened interference with certain functions which were planned, but these difficulties having been happily overcome, there will be nothing to mar the pleasure of the fete.

— x —

A POSTAL INNOVATION OF IMPORTANCE, which is on the point of getting to work, was arranged for late in August, and becomes operative on October 1st. It provides for the transmission of parcels not exceeding eleven pounds in weight, between the United States and Germany, at the rate of twelve cents a pound. We have made a similar arrangement already with Mexico, Hawaii, Newfoundland, and divers other near-by places, but Germany is the first European country to join us in such an agreement. Arrangements of the same sort with France and Great Britain are likely to follow promptly.

WHILE THE PARCELS POST IS AN innovation which will be most favorably received by the public at large, and particularly by institutions having commercial relations with Germany, the express companies who see in government competition a loss of revenue, are opposing the action taken by the Post Office department, even claiming that the Postmaster General exceeded his authority in making the treaty, and that such power is vested only in Congress. If this be the case, which may be doubted, it would not take Congress very long to dispose of the matter, should opportunity offer. The public is now paying revenue taxes imposed on express companies by the government, of one cent on each receipt, a charge which the common carriers declined to assume, and in the face of adverse public sentiment Congress would hardly enact a piece of legislation favorable to them. The contrary would more likely be the case, and probably will be, by creating a domestic parcels post and extending the system to other countries.

— x —

BETWEEN "PHYSIOLOGICAL PSYCHOLOGY" and indulgence in other fads, crying needs of the Chicago public school system have been overlooked, and at the present time the capacity of the schools is totally inadequate. Truant laws have not been enforced, although an attempt has been made to enforce the State law, which requires the education of children until they have attained the age of fourteen years. This law has been productive of much good, particularly in cases where child labor is employed. Several of the great department stores maintain schools in connection, and the children in their employ are given the rudiments of an education. In the case of incorrigible boys, there has been no recourse but to place them in an educational institution maintained especially for boys who are serving sentence for some minor offence. As the effect of such association is not beneficial, it has been decided to erect a large school, where influences will be wholesome, to which habitual truants may be committed, there to remain until fourteen years of age.

PROBABLY THERE HAS NEVER been a greater demonstration in the history of the country than has marked the return of Admiral Dewey. It is not the city of New York which has extended the welcome, rather the nation, represented by nearly two million visitors. The return of Admiral Dewey afforded an outlet for feelings long pent up, and which are characteristic of human nature—deep admiration for personal bravery and courage. It was not an outburst of imperialistic sentiment, but an abiding love for the man who carried the colors of the United States to a glorious victory. The nation has shown in a demonstrative way its gratitude, but the demonstration did not shift the mental ballast of Admiral Dewey. The entire crew of the "Olympia" and of every vessel participating in the engagement of Manila Bay, is given due credit, each sailor for his part. Glory for Admiral Dewey means glory for the navy. Jeweled swords and loving cups, and a residence in Washington, are substantial tokens of the regard in which the ranking officer of the navy is held.

IN CHICAGO, WITHIN THE MONTH, the tax dodger has afforded a disgusting spectacle of dishonest citizenship. It is a strange thing when people who, in all commercial transactions are souls of honor, will deliberately plot to wrong the municipality out of that amount of money which is justly due in taxes. Many men who are ever ready to aid financially any worthy or charitable undertaking, and who take prominent parts in movements toward civic betterment, apparently forget that evasion of just and equitable taxation is no less dishonorable than evasion of a commercial obligation. Under the Illinois law, sworn schedules were required to be filed, and it has been discovered by legal investigation that many schedules thus filed, so low as to cause merriment to the Board of Review, were prepared by some disinterested person having no connection with the firm—at least this is the testimony of many of the Hebraic contingent before the grand jury. Unfortunately, there is some distance between certainty of guilt and the ability to prove it.

THE RECENT PUBLICATION OF THE report of Brigadier-General Ludlow, military-governor of the city of Havana, lends encouragement to the belief that Cuba may eventually become a self-respecting and self-governing community. The Havana of to-day is unlike the Havana of the war. From being a breeding place of disease and seat of disorder, it has been transformed, under American supervision, into a healthy, cleanly place of residence, and an orderly and well-policed community. Occasional outbreaks do not indicate restlessness of the populace; on the contrary, the people seem anxious to co-operate in any measures which promise better conditions. The death rate this year has been exceptionally low, due to precautionary measures against yellow fever. Schools have been opened, and neglected children cared for. The strike of laboring men has been suppressed, and all branches of industry are reported to be thriving.

MARQUIS DE GALLIFET, PRESENT Minister of War of France, is either a very dangerous enemy of the republic, or the victim of an atrocious forgery, the like of which have made recent pages of French history disgusting in the eyes of honorable men. Recently General Gallifet denied publicly that he had held any communication of late with the Duke of Orleans, and the Intransigent, the notorious anti-Dreyfus sheet, replies by publishing a letter alleged to have been written by the Minister of War to the pretender to the throne, in which sentiments anything but complimentary to the republic are expressed. Viewed from any standpoint, the incident cannot but create amazement. It is inconceivable that Marquis de Gallifet should accept an important portfolio with the intention of betraying the government, and, on the other hand, what can be thought of the morals of France, if the letter is a forgery?

A good deal of business was transacted at the meeting of the rural deanery of Wentworth, held at Dundas. A resolution was passed asking the clergy to prepare short histories of their respective parishes for incorporation in the diocesan registrar's book. A very warm welcome home was given the rector of St. George's church, Hamilton, at a reception held for the purpose, Sept. 6th, in the basement of the church. The Bishop and many of the clergy were present and made addresses.

Diocese of Algoma

Bishop Thornloe visited the parishes of Fort William the first Sunday in September, holding Confirmations in St. John's church in the morning, and in St. Luke's church in the evening. St. Thomas' church, West Fort William, has been greatly improved lately. The Rev. A. H. Allman was inducted into the parish of Emsdale by the Ven. Archdeacon Llydd, appointed by the Bishop to do so, on Aug. 24th. A public meeting was arranged in connection with St. John's church, Fort William, on Sept. 14th. The Bishop and many of the clergy were expected to be present.

Diocese of Nova Scotia

A missionary conference was arranged to take place in Lunenburg, Oct. 4th and 5th. A large number of the sailors from the war ships in the harbor marched to St. Mark's church, Halifax, headed by their fife and drum corps, on the first Sunday in September, for morning service; Admiral Bedford and family also were present. Rural Dean Almon has met with a generous response from the people in Guysborough, where he has been doing deputation work. Bishop Courtney has been preaching at Newport, R. I., during his holidays. The Rev. Mr. Hind has been appointed Bishop's chaplain, to the charge of St. Stephen's chapel, Halifax. A new church is being built at For Bay, where there has never been a church building of any kind, the nearest church being 12 miles distant. A chancel is being built for the church at Cole Harbor.

Diocese of Rupert's Land

The Archbishop went to British Columbia in the middle of August, to render what help he can to Bishop Dart, of New Westminster, who is so seriously ill, and to visit the parishes in the province as Primate of Canada. There was a very interesting service in St. John's cathedral, Winnipeg, the day before the Archbishop's departure, when the font in memory of Bishop Anderson, presented by his sister, Miss Anderson, was dedicated.

Chicago

Wm. Edward McLaren, D.D., D.C.L., Bishop

On Sunday evening last there was the first of a series of festival services in the Epiphany.

The Rev. Dr. Stone has returned, and occupied his pulpit in St. James' last Sunday for the first time since the beginning of July.

Mr. Donnan of the seminary, who is lay-reader in charge of the growing mission at Harvey, won the prize for elocution at the summer session of Chicago University.

Before a large number of his fellow-presbyters at the Monday clerics in the Church club, the Rev. F. J. Hall gave some very interesting reminiscences of his recent visit to England.

The connection between St. Peter's, Lake View, and the North Dakota mission at Walhalla is further cemented by the latter being in charge of the present rector's brother, who is a candidate for Holy Orders in the missionary jurisdiction of the late rector, now Bishop.

The Bishop's Visitations

The Bishop visited Christ church, Woodlawn, Sunday morning, and subsequently the Home for Incurables, where he confirmed a lady, the first occasion on which the rite had been administered in that institution.

The Delegation to Omaha

Major Taylor E. Brown, secretary of the Church Club, and a parishioner of the Rev. A. L. Williams, asks for the names of those who purpose being members of the delegation to Omaha, on the occasion of the Coadjutor's consecration on the 18th, in order that he may arrange the special car service and railway fare before the 10th.

St. Luke's, S. Evanston

The revenue has been increased by the change from free to rented sittings. It is pleasant to hear that the rector, the Rev. D. F. Smith, was absent from his parish but one Sunday this summer, taking his only vacation of two weeks with his choir in camp at Lake Delavan.

Church of the Ascension, Chicago

On the eve of the Feast of St. Michael's there was full choral Evensong, and a sermon by the Rev. J. H. Hopkins, rector of Epiphany; at the close of which the Bishop passed through the several rooms of the new parish house adjoining, in a service of dedication, returning to the church to pronounce the benediction. In continuation of this week of commemoration of the 42d anniversary of the founding of the parish, there were services on Michaelmas, with a children's festival the following evening, intended to take the place of the ordinary Christmas observance, prizes being awarded, and the two choir medals assigned. On Sunday morning the Rev. J. M. Chatten was the special preacher, and on Monday evening of this week there was a general parish reception.

Northeastern Deanery

The third quarterly meeting for the year was held in Trinity church, Highland Park, on Tuesday, Sept. 26th. The celebrant at the 11 A. M. service was Bishop elect Williams, assisted by the rector, the Rev. P. C. Wolcott. The convocation was called to order by the Rev. C. P. Anderson, acting for the dean, the Rev. Dr. Clinton Locke; 45 members answered to the roll call, the large attendance being due to the fact that this was to be the last occasion on which the rector of Christ church would meet those assembled, as a member of the deanery, of which he had been for a year or so the secretary. The paper read was by the Rev. W. C. Richardson, rector of Trinity, his subject being "The Roman idea and Church Unity." The following brief analysis is enough to explain the keen attention with which it was heard:

Though it should not be deemed as merely a favorite idea of the writer's, he could advance it as one of considerable interest, that there might be a possibility of the Pope eventually becoming the great unifier of Christianity, if one viewed the thought from a Protestant standpoint. Protestants regard us as on the same level with themselves. Their embarkation has set in upon a course of recovery embracing not only ritual and doctrine, but ministry also. This recovery in view of the centralizing tendency of the age, terminates logically in the episcopate. They can hardly be expected to seek it from us with whom their predecessors had quarrels. Their relations with Rome have not been of that character. Neither from the Old nor the Greek Catholics could they obtain it. In various places there have been strivings after reformation in the Roman Communion. It is not of necessity discouraging that the Jesuits should have gained an apparent victory over the well-meaning Leo XIII. Through centuries of beginnings, and with frequent reverses, was the Anglican Reformation itself dragged. The world was at one time dominated by the Roman idea in its ancient civil form, and even made over again by it. When the empire disappeared, the Church adopted, assumed, and continued the idea. The Roman Church has to-day the prestige attached to numbers. It feels the influence of Protestantism, and in America of the American spirit. While the supremacy has been repudiated by the Anglican Communion, the primacy has not, and so it could readily come into union with Rome; the sine qua non being the reformation of the papacy, and its reduction to primitive limits and dimensions. And in the absence of a direct feud between Rome and such bodies as Presbyterians et al, a gate might be thrown open, whereby even these sects might come under its centralizing influence.

There was little time for discussion of the interesting paper, for at 1 P. M., on the invitation of Mr. Wolcott, an adjournment was had to the Highland Park club-house. Justice having been done to the dainty lunch provided and served by the ladies of the parish, the chairman, in a few happy remarks, introduced the several speakers, himself emphasizing the approaching translation of his fellow priest, from the condition of a revolving planet to the status of "a fixed star," and eulogizing him for his practical knowledge of requirements for mission work, and as a priest who had popularized the Church without any lowering of tone. The Rev. Mr. Wolcott, after welcoming the deanery to his parish, deprecated the idea of "too much Williams," when such men as their guest were being brought into the Church by the conviction wrought by perusal of "Reasons for being a Churchman." This reference naturally called to his feet the esteemed author of the work, who observed that if Mr. Williams was his "son in the faith," the designation, "grandson in the faith," might fairly be applied to one whom Mr. Williams had been instrumental in bringing within the fold. Dr. Little also adduced some amusing instances of perversion in the use of the word "co-adjutor," for while an assistant bishop should know "how to abound and how to be abased," a newspaper had, a few years ago, spoken of such an one as a co-adjutor. The telegraph operator had improved upon this by making it co-jupiter. Dr. Rushton, Mr. Williams' predecessor at Christ church, Woodlawn, made his eulogy take the form of arraignment of his friend on the score of his great success as a parish priest. The Rev. Dr. Gold, as Mr. Williams' instructor in the seminary, bore witness to the latter's docility as a student, all the more noticeable from his having entered upon his course in adult years, and with considerable experience, as himself accustomed, for some years previous, to be in command of men. The Doctor voiced his unreserved elation at having two of those whom he had trained elevated to the episcopate in one year. The Bishop of Chicago then presented, in behalf of the deanery, a massive episcopal ring to Bishop-coadjutor-elect A. L. Williams, affirming that he not only coincided fully with the high opinion expressed by former speakers, but would be able, had time permitted, to supplement by added eulogy all that had been said of him who was to be advanced on St. Luke's Day to the highest dignity in the Church. Mr. Williams, in reply, said that all the nice things spoken of him by his Bishop and assembled presbyters, so invested his approaching separation from the diocese with a feeling of sorrow, that he was almost in the condition of the man who thought it preferable to be a lamp-post in Chicago than mayor of any other city. And yet he could only assign as a reason for his unexpected election that the Holy Ghost had work for him to do. And it would be his aim so to act as to prove that, while the Church made the man, the man should spend his life in exploiting the Church. The Rev. John Henry Hopkins, having returned thanks for the use of the club-house, and for the bountiful provision and service of the ladies, the meeting adjourned, after many complimentary expressions of approbation of the aptness and tact displayed by the Rev. C. P. Anderson in his position as chairman.

Archdeaconry of Westchester

At the annual meeting just held, Archdeacon Van Kleeck made an address, on "Ye ought to support the weak." The annual report of the treasurer showed an income of $5,047.61, and expenditure of $4,652.91, leaving a good balance to start the new year. Nearly the entire sum paid out went as stipends to the 12 clergy on the missionary staff working under the archdeacon. The executive committee were re-elected, as were also the secretary and treasurer. Missionary reports were presented, and a memorial adopted regarding the late Rev. Dr. Carver.

The Annual Diocesan Convention

Its sessions were held at the church of the Incarnation, New York city, Sept. 27th, Bishop Potter presiding. The proceedings were among the most interesting of recent years, and were made notable by the assertion of a spirit of protest against the recent ordination of the Rev. Dr. Briggs, and by action affecting divorce and the Sunday question. At the Eucharistic service at the opening, the Bishop was celebrant, assisted by the Ven. Archdeacons Tiffany and Thomas, and the Rev. Dr. Morgan Dix. In his address to the convention, the Bishop referred to the deaths of Bishops Williams and Pierce, of Mr. Cornelius Vanderbilt, and of well-known clergymen and laymen of the diocese who have passed away since the last session. He made no allusion to the Briggs controversy, which was in all minds, but took occasion to call forcible attention to urgent questions of the time. His remarks upon divorce and remarriage will be found on page 505. On the question of Sunday observance, he said:

It ought surely to sober us that along with the decay of family integrity and the sanctity of the marriage tie, there has gone side by side a no less wide decay of the observance of the Lord's Day and of other sacred times and seasons. In our eagerness to prove that we are no longer Puritans some of us seem anxious to demonstrate that we are pagans, and the secularization of the Lord's Day, especially by people with abundant leisure on other days, for social exchanges and every kind of recreation, is a scandal of which they who are guilty of it should be ashamed, and for which all Christian people have cause to grieve. There are, indeed, those whose hard tasks and scant leisure on week days may in some measure excuse the employment of some part of Sunday in innocent relaxation, but pleas of this sort in the mouths of many who urge them deserve alone the derision or the contempt of every honest mind.

On motion of Mr. Geo. Macculloch Miller, a special committee was appointed to consider the portion of the episcopal address dealing with divorce and the observance of the Lord's Day. The diocesan officers and usual committees were continued, and routine reports presented. A resolution presented by the Rev. Dr. Dix, was adopted as follows:

Resolved, That the clergy and laity of the diocese of New York, now assembled in convention, take this occasion to welcome Admiral Dewey on his safe return home, and to send him, their fellow-Churchman, this expression of their personal admiration and regard, and their appreciation of his late brilliant services to our country.

At night a special service was held at the church of the Ascension, and a reception was given to delegates at Bishop Potter's residence. At the service the general topic considered was: "The condition of religious life and work at the close of the nineteenth century." The Rev. Dr. J. Lewis Parks spoke on "Religious thought;" the Rev. Dr. George M. Christian, on "Christian work;" and the Rev. Dr. William R. Huntington on "Christian Unity and its outlook." At the second day's session the delegates from this diocese to the Federate Council of dioceses of the State were re-elected, as also the Standing Committee. The election of the latter had been made the subject of organic attack on the recent policy in the matter of Dr. Briggs' ordination. A meeting of certain of the clergy had been held in advance, to further a contest, it being felt that whether successful or not, a determined protest should be made in the shape of putting up rival candidates. Regarding some former members of the committee, notably Dr. Dix, there was no opposition. The strength of the vote adverse to the committee was a general surprise, and did not fully express the force of feeling on this subject, as many of the clergy and laity while sympathizing with the protest, hesitated to take heroic measures. The feature of the second day's session was the able report of the committee on divorce and Sunday observance, which was partly as follows:

Report of Special Committee

The committee are glad that the Bishop has now laid his hand upon two of the gravest evils of the hour. The desecration of the Lord's Day, carried to wider extremes of license, is threatening the integrity of this people as a God-fearing nation. The steady spread of loose views as to the stability of the marriage contract, and the reckless ease with which the relations of married people are dissolved by divorce, are similarly threatening the existence of the family and the home. We believe that there are no two points to which our chief pastor could more seasonably have pointed the finger of warning; we wish that his impressive words might be read and heard by every member of the Church in this diocese and seriously laid to heart.

The Lord's Day was intended to be a time of refreshing for body and soul; a day of rest from toil; a day wherein to give God due honor in His church; a day for seasonable recreation. In all these relations its purpose has been forgotten, and its blessing lost. There is a wide neglect of public worship; there is a growing tendency to turn this day into a time for mere secular amusement and dissipation. Our youth deny an obligation to go to church; they go if they please, but if not, it makes no difference; a large number never appear there.

The day is devoted to bicycle riding, excursions, golf, tennis; in the evening the latest scandal is given by large dinners and social receptions, with music and other delights; all idea of religious duty or observance is lost; God listens for the voice of man in praise, prayer, and worship, but listens in vain. Judgment must follow an offence such as this: on the complete banishment of religious action from the once sacred day, and its prostitution to the purposes of diversion, amusement, and social dissipation.

No nation ever stood secure which deliberately broke the Fourth Commandment and left God without one day in seven to call His own. And the class which has done the most to desecrate the day by frivolousness and gay looseness of living is that one which, by conspicuous social position, wealth, and opportunity, might have thrown the heaviest weight into the scale on the side of orderly living and respect for the divine institution. The fashionable class, as they are called, are easily leaders in the melancholy work of corrupting the morals of the community and the manners of the age.

In the fatal drift on the way towards a general undoing of the marriage tie, we have reached a point at which men and women are looking about with amazement, and with the wish to know what can be done to avert a dire and wide calamity. Divorces multiply; the facilities for separation are liberally afforded; the circumstances under which the marriage bond is dissolved render the process more and more offensive; in many instances shame would seem to have faded, and conscience and the sense of duty to have become extinct. Men and women outrage the divine law, and render themselves liable to prosecution and punishment under our human statutes: they easily obtain the dissolution of the ties by which they were bound by mutual promise and vow; they proceed with as little delay as possible to enter into new relations contrary to God's Word, and stigmatized as adulterous by our Lord Jesus Christ; and yet these offenders are permitted to retain their place in the circles in which they move; their actions, though criminal in the eye of the law and the judgments of the courts, are condoned in society, and they are accepted as in good standing and beyond reproach.

Families are broken up, homes ruined under frivolous pretenses or at the dictate of lawless passion, yet it is assumed that these things should be left to the individual as his or her personal concern, and not the concern of the social circle in which they move, and feeble, if any, opposition is made to the exoneration and full rehabilitation of offenders whose acts merit the reproof of just and honorable men.

These sins against human and divine law are not committed only by the low, degraded, and the ignorant; they are most conspicuously manifest in the case of what are known as the higher classes; persons arrogating to themselves the character of social leaders have been among the most reckless in contempt for obligation and duty, and most flagrant among the offenders against God and Christian institutions; while it is a deplorable fact that their associates and companions in the very class which might and ought to exert a salutary influence in frowning on transgression and trying to keep society pure, appear to take their part, and even to justify and applaud their conduct. We are reaching a point at which alarm is daily growing greater, and disgrace and indignation are more widely felt; a point at which the opinion is gaining ground, to which the Bishop has referred, that legislation is advisable which shall prohibit the remarriage of divorced persons under any circumstances whatever.

We are, therefore, thankful that the Bishop of New York has called the attention of the clergy and laity of the diocese to our danger—a danger which increases. Legislation on this subject may be useful in this connection; but, if taken, it must be taken by the General Convention. A joint commission, composed of bishops, clergy, and laity, has under consideration the canons relating to marriage and divorce; a committee of clerical and lay delegates is similarly engaged in an effort to devise means for the more effectual protection of our families and homes. The prayers of the people should daily ascend to God, that He will give wisdom and understanding to our Church legislators, and light to see what they should do. But it must be felt by all that legislation will prove of little avail, unless the conscience and heart of the people can be touched; that the evil lies in the unruly wills and affections of sinful men and sinful women; there, after all, must the reform begin; and if it do not begin there and proceed thence, there is little hope in canons and laws.

Your committee, profoundly impressed by the danger signals of these times, and grateful to the Bishop for his strong words and valuable suggestions, offers for adoption the following resolutions:

Resolved: That the thanks of the clergy and laity of the diocese be given to their Bishop, for his utterances on the subject of the Lord's Day and the ordinance of Holy Matrimony.

Resolved: That it is the desire of the committee that the attention of all our people should be called to the portion of the address which was referred to us.

Resolved: That we view with sorrow and fear the wide decay in the observance in the Lord's Day, and in the sacred times and seasons of the Christian Year.

Resolved: That we regard with similar dread and sadness of heart the decay of the idea of the sanctity of marriage and the ease with which the marriage tie is dissolved.

Resolved: That it be respectfully suggested to the clergy of this diocese that they call the attention of their congregations at such time or times as may be suitable, to the recent counsels of the Bishop, in these parts of his address relating to the Lord's Day and Holy Matrimony; adding thereto their own counsel and advice on these unspeakably important subjects.

Ozi William Whitaker, D.D., LL.D., Bishop

At the regular meeting of the Clerical Brotherhood held on Monday, 25th ult., at the Church House, the Rev. Dr. W. Dudley Powers, secretary of the American Church Missionary Society, delivered an interesting address on Cuba.

For several years past, on Saturday afternoons from October to June, a large number of Sunday school teachers have assembled to study the lesson for the day following. During the present month of October, commencing on the 7th inst, the Rev. R. W. Forsyth will have charge of this instruction at the Church House, Philadelphia.

The Rev. C. G. Brady has assumed charge of the memorial church of St. Paul, at Overbrook, a thriving suburb of Philadelphia, and, on the 1st inst, became its first rector. The new church edifice is rapidly approaching completion, and will be consecrated at an early day.

St. Elisabeth's Mission, Philadelphia

Since the beginning of the present year, the Rev. Wm. McGarvey, rector of St. Elisabeth's church, assisted by members of the C. S. S. S., has maintained a mission house at 1419 Porter st., about a half-mile south of the church. It is open every Sunday, has a children's service at 2:30 P. M., and Evensong at 8 P. M.

Bequest to St. James', Philadelphia

In the will of Elisabeth D. Alsop, admitted to probate 23d ult., ten shares of Pennsylvania railroad stock are bequeathed to the Industrial School and Mission at 2112-14 Fitzwater st., which is one of the many parish agencies of St. James' church, the Rev. Dr. J. B. Blanchard, rector.

Church of the Nativity, Philadelphia

The 55th anniversary of the laying of the corner-stone was observed on Sunday, 24th ult., by special services. In the morning the rector, the Rev. L. N. Caley, preached. In the afternoon, the Rev. Winfield S. Baer addressed the Sunday schools and the young people of the parish; and in the evening the Rev. Floyd W. Tomkins was the preacher.

Bishop Whitaker's Return

After an absence of eight weeks and one day, the Bishop, in renewed health and strength, reached Philadelphia on Sunday, 24th ult. With the exception of a few days in Rotterdam, where he met Dr. Seth Low and other commissioners of the Peace Conference, he passed all his time at the Righi, Switzerland, 5,000 ft. above sea level.

Old St. Paul's, Philadelphia

The rectorship of the Rev. Wm. McGarvey terminated in September, 1893 and since that period the Rev. Messrs. E. R. Baxter and R. N. Thomas have been in charge. On the 1st inst, the Rev. T. J. Taylor, of the City Mission, took hold of the work and will endeavor to resuscitate this old and, in former years, prosperous parish. In its day, it had several notable rectors, e. g., the elder Rev. Dr. Tyng, the late Bishop McCoskry, and the Rev. Dr. Richard Newton. The church edifice was erected about A. D. 1765, and was admitted into union with the first diocesan convention of Pennsylvania in 1785, along with old Christ church and St. Peter's.

Pittsburgh

Cortlandt Whitehead, D.D., Bishop

Parish Reception at Crafton

On Monday evening, Sept. 18th, in the new parish house of the church of the Nativity, the ladies' guild tendered a reception to the rector, the Rev. Frank Steed and his wife, upon their return from a trip to England. The Rev. L. F. Cole, archdeacon of the diocese, who accompanied them on their journey, also participated in the reception. Music was furnished by a mandolin club. Refreshments were served by the ladies, addresses were made by the two clergymen above named, and a letter of welcome and congratulation was read from the Bishop who was unable to be present. The reception was largely attended by members of the congregation and invited guests from other parishes.

Anniversary at Oakmont

Wednesday, Sept. 27th, was the 25th anniversary of the first service held in St. Thomas' church. There was a celebration of the Holy Communion by the Bishop, assisted by the former rectors of the parish. The sermon was preached by the Rev. F. M. S. Taylor. Addresses of congratulation were made by the Bishop, the Rev. George Rogers, and the Rev. Laurens McLure, S. T. D., rector. At the close of the service luncheon was served in the parish house. St. Thomas' parish was organized and a charter obtained in June, 1874; a church building was erected, and the first service held in it on Sunday, Sept. 27th, by the Rev. Dr. H. W. Spalding, rector of St. Peter's church, Pittsburgh. The Communion plate for the new Church was made of family silver, contributed for the purpose by several families of the Paul and Metcalf connection. Mr. Orlando Metcalf, and Mr. J. W. Paul gave the rectory in 1887. In 1896 a building that had been used as a Sunday school room was entirely remodeled inside, and since that time has been in use as a place of worship, the first church having proved too small to hold the average congregations. A handsome brick and stone building was erected during 1898 as a parish house, and was opened by Bishop Whitehead with a service of benediction on Jan. 17th, 1899. On the same lot ground has been broken for a new rectory, which it is expected will be finished in the spring of 1900, and it is purposed in the near future, when ability permits, to erect a handsome stone church. St. Thomas' parish has been self-supporting from the start, and has always contributed liberally to the missionary work of the diocese, and the Church at large. The Rev. Laurens McLure, S. T. D., has been in charge since 1892. St. Thomas' mission at Sandy Creek was begun during the rectorship of the Rev. Stephen A. McNulty, and has since been cared for and sustained by the church at Oakmont.

The Rev. J. R. Wightman has been appointed by the Bishop, chaplain of the Layman's Missionary League, with the title of Archdeacon of Pittsburgh, and will enter upon his duties as such on Oct. 15th.

Gift to Rev. Dr. Carey

The Rev. Dr. J. Carey, rector of Bethesda church, Saratoga, has received for himself and family from two of his parishioners, the gift of a fine residence in Saratoga. The donors are Mr. and Mrs. Jas. A. Moore. The residence is an imposing three story brick structure, with commanding location and large lawn. It is a much finer residence than the parish rectory. It is expected that the new organ presented to Bethesda church will soon be put in place.

Archdeaconry of Ogdensburg

The autumn meeting convened on Sept 19th and 20th, at Fort Covington. This is an old town, but comparatively a new mission, to which is ecclesiastically joined that of Hogsburg. This mission has a new church, practically complete. The small band of loyal Churchmen have had a serious task in bringing about the healthy state of matters now existing, but their beautiful edifice stands ready for consecration. The missionary, the Rev. H. J. Hamilton, is on leave of absence, the duties being faithfully discharged by the Rev. Fred Thompson, acting as locum tenens. The attendance of the clergy at this meeting was more than ordinarily full, and being so near the Canadian border, was supplemented by a deputation from the sister Church. By invitation, the Rev. R. L. M. Houston, rector of Cornwall, and rural dean of Stormont, read at the first meeting a forcible and valuable paper, on "The Continuity of the Church." On the second day the Holy Eucharist was celebrated by the archdeacon, the Rev. Richard Mercer preaching the sermon ad clerum. The choir rendered excellent music. At the business meeting, 12 of the rectors and missionaries responded to roll call. On the invitation of the archdeacon, the diocesan missionary, the Rev. J. N. Marvin, delivered an interesting address, giving among other news the pleasing information that the exterior of the church at Tupper's Lake had been pushed successfully to completion, and was free from incumbrance. He concurred in the report of a phenomenal work having been in progress at Lake Placid during the summer, under the leadership of the Rev. Wm. M. Moir who was in temporary charge. On one of the Sundays in the month of August, at the request of the Diocesan, the Bishop of New York, having administered Baptism and Confirmation to nine persons, celebrated the Holy Eucharist in St. Eustace's church, an estimate placing the recipients at nearly 300. Money to the amount of $1,500, and various gifts, had been bestowed upon the church, and the hope ardently expressed that Mr Moir may return there the next summer. Norwood and Waddington report matters moving in the right direction, with canonical obligations discharged; while at Massena the vestry recently increased the salary of the missionary. The rector of Colton reported that he was moving into the new rectory, a handsome building replacing that burned last winter. It includes a commodious parish room. St. John's church, Ogdensburg, recently dedicated a handsome marble and polished brass altar rail, the Rev. E. L. Sanford officiating. Santa Clara, a pretty Adirondack village, noted for its sanitary advantages, has become an independent mission, and offers for the right kind of a man, not a munificent salary, but congenial environments and abundant work. The Rev. Mr. Hawkins reports substantial progress in his two missions, Vermontville and Bloomingdale. Gouverneur, Morristown, Canton, tell the old story of regular operations, steady services, aggressive work. A cheering report was made by the Rev. W. H. Larom, of Saranac Lake and Paul Smith's. He was prosecuting his old work with renewed vigor. The Rev. Alfred C. Wilson, of Malone, spoke of increasing strength and good work along Church lines. The meeting choose as delegates to the Board of Missions, the former members, the Rev. W. H. Larom and Mr. L. Hasbrouck. After Evensong two excellent papers were read, the first by Archdeacon Kirby, on "The Church's ministry," the second, "Our liturgy," by the Rev. A. L. Fortin, after which followed the final adjournment.

Ohio

Wm. Andrew Leonard, D.D., Bishop

A few of the "silent brethren" of Canton joined with those of Massillon, on Friday evening, Sept. 22d, when a "combined service" was conducted by the Rev. C. M. Roberts, the rector, and the Rev. A. W. Mann, at St. Timothy's church. Many of the regular congregation attended the service. On the preceding evening, Mr. Mann officiated at St. Agnes' Deaf-Mute mission, in the chapel of Grace church, Cleveland.

St. Andrew's Brotherhood

The September meeting of the local council was held in Trinity church parlors, Toledo, on Tuesday, 19th ult. All the city clergy except two were present. Mr. J. E. Heath presided. The Rev. Dr. W. C. Hopkins conducted the devotional exercises at the opening, and the Rev. W. C. Clapp at the close. Trinity chapter reported some good work in the hospital. Grace chapter meets at 6:15 p. m. on Sundays, and has papers read and reports of visiting. Mr. G. F. Austin gave an able account of the late convention of the Brotherhood in Canada.

Calvary Church, Sandusky

The corner-stone of the new church was laid Sept. 17th, by the Bishop of the diocese. Shortly before 3 o'clock from the old church building a procession moved to the new building. A platform had been erected at the southwest corner of the structure, where the stone was to be laid. A small organ and two cornets furnished music. The Rev. Robert J. Freeborn read the prayers. The Rev. A. B. Nicholson, who is acting rector of Grace parish, and who was for nine years rector of Calvary, read the lesson. The Rev. E. V. Shayler, the present rector, read a list of the articles placed in the copper box within the corner-stone. The Bishop then laid the stone and made an address. The rector followed with a few remarks, and the service closed with prayer by the Bishop. From the date of Mr. Shayler's advent in 1896, the parish has been absolutely independent and free from outside aid. The following statistics will show some of the results accomplished during the present rectorate: Persons baptized, 199; prepared and presented for Holy Confirmation, 155; burials, 92; amount of money raised exclusive of new church $9,560.41. The communicant list has increased from 70 to 306. The increase in attendance upon the services and Sunday school has proven the incompleteness and insufficiency of the present building. A piece of ground, corner Meigs and First sts., was pur chased for the erection of a new church. The building is to be of the perpendicular Gothic design, is 128 ft. long and 75 ft. wide at the transepts, being cruciform in shape. The main entrance will be through the tower doorway. A beautiful baptistry is located just inside the door.

Massachusetts

William Lawrence, D. D., Bishop

The three local chapters of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew in South Boston, will hold a devotional meeting on Sunday afternoon, Oct. 22nd, at 4 p. m., in St. Matthew's church. All men are cordially invited.

St. Stephen's Church, Boston,

Has been undergoing repairs during the summer. The interior has been much improved. A new floor has been laid, and new pews put in. The walls have a lighter tint, and the windows have been changed so as to give more light. The organ has also been thoroughly repaired, and is considered one of the best in the city. The Rev. C. H. Brent has returned and taken up his duties.

Corner-Stone Laid, St. James, Amesbury,

By the Bishop of the diocese, Sept. 26th, in the presence of a large number of people. Archdeacon Van Buren and the Rev. Messrs. Wright, Braddon, and Lynch made addresses. Services are now held temporarily in Webster's block. The Bishop and visiting clergy were the guests of the Whittier Home Association at their place on Friend st. The church is being erected on the old site on Main st. It will be Gothic in style, 98 ft. long by 38 ft. wide. The front will be of rubble stone with rough granite trimmings. The front elevation with the tower is 58 ft. The main entrance will consist of a double arched door with granite capping, and will be reached by five marble steps. The sides of the church will be of rubble stone to the bottom of windows, with sides shingled, and a slated roof. The nave will be 66 by 35 ft., and will contain 12 windows, six on either side. The seating capacity will be 250. The chancel measures 13 by 23 ft. The interior finish and furnishings will be of white wood stained to resemble black walnut. The vestry will contain a kitchen, ladies' parlor, choir room, toilet and boiler rooms. The church will be ready for services by Christmas. The Rev. R. B. Lynch took charge of the parish in October, 1898, and to him, in a large degree, is due the success of the project of the new church building.

Kansas

Frank Rosebrook Millsbaugh, D.D., Bishop

Consecration of Church at Augusta

The church of the Atonement was consecrated on Friday, the 22d, by the Bishop, assisted by Archdeacon Crawford, the Rev. Dr. Beatty, the Rev. Messrs. R. Talbot, L. L. Swan, W. E. Vann, and the lay-reader of the mission, Mr. Randall. The church is a substantial stone building, and its interior arrangements are very pretty and Churchly. It is the result of the almost unaided efforts of the lay-reader who came here four years ago as a clerk in his father's store. There being no services of the Church held in the city, he read the service to his own family; later on applying for a lay-reader's license, a hall was rented, then a cottage was purchased, and as soon as funds could be raised the church was built on the site of this cottage. Among the gifts to the mission is a beautiful marble font, the finest in the diocese. The Rev. Dr. Beatty is the priest-in-charge.

The Fortieth Annual Convention

Held in St. John's church, Wichita, Sept 27th and 28th. The Holy Eucharist was celebrated by the Bishop of the diocese, the Bishop-coadjutor of Minnesota assisting. The sermon was preached by Bishop Gilbert, who referred very touchingly to the past and present relations of the two dioceses, Minnesota having given to Kansas the loving and beloved Bishop Thomas, of blessed memory, the present earnest and indefatigable Diocesan, and some of his clergy. On the call of the roll, 27 clergy and 23 lay delegates responded or subsequently reported. The Rev. Canon Bywater was unanimously elected secretary, and the Rev. Chas. H. Powell was appointed his assistant. The Bishop appointed the usual committees.

The Standing Committee was elected by ballot as follows: The Rev. A. Beatty, S. T. D., president, the Rev. Messrs. John W. Sykes, John Bennett, W. W. Ayres; the Hon. Judge Albert Horton, Prof. Fred E. Stimson, Mr. D. W. Nellis, and Hon. O. H. Bently. Reports from the schools of the diocese were very gratifying, showing a larger number of pupils in all of them than in former years. The reports of the archdeacons of Eastern and Western Kansas showed that immense work had been done for the year. An official communication from the Rev. Dr. Hutchins, referring to the resolution at the last General Convention, that certain changes be made in Art. 1, 2, and 3 of the General Constitution was read and considered. A Sunday School Institute for the diocese was organized, and the time of its annual gathering selected for the last Tuesday afternoon and evening in the month of September.

The deans of convocation were appointed by the Bishop and confirmed by convention: Dean of Fort Scott, the Rev. John Bennett; dean of Atchison, the Rev. Charles Rowland Hill; dean of Wichita, the Rev. J. D. Krum, D. D.; dean of Salina, the Rev. Irving Baxter. The Ven. C. B. Crawford, archdeacon of Eastern Kansas, and the Hon. O. H. Bently, were elected to represent the diocese in the Missionary Council of 1899. A synopsis of the official acts of the Diocesan shows: Ordinations, priests, 2, deacons, 1; clergy in the diocese, 1 bishop, 39 priests, four deacons, total, 44; postulants, 3; candidates for Holy Orders, 4; licensed lay readers, 30. The Bishop made 118 visitations, baptized 28 infants and 19 adults; confirmed 318 persons; preached 127 sermons, delivered 187 addresses, and lectured 256 times in the Kansas Divinity School; administered Holy Communion 62 times; consecrated 4 churches, reopened 1, laid corner stone of 1; married 3 couples, organized Auxiliary in two places, inducted 10 Daughters of the King, catechised 17 times, presided over 35 meetings, and received the sum of 409 41, an offering for the Bishop's Purse (for the urgent need of missionaries and missions). The reports show a large increase in funds received and expended within the diocese.

A cordial invitation, tendered by the Rev. J. T. Foster for the next annual meeting to be at Emporia, was accepted by the convention.

West Virginia

George W. Peterkin, D.D., LL.D., Bishop

The fifth session of the Episcopal Hall, in connection with the State University at Morgantown, was opened Monday, Oct. 2d. The hall will be under the charge of the Rev. C. G. Hannah, vice the Rev. Thomas E. Winecoff, resigned.

The congregation of Spruce Run mission, which was recently organized, have succeeded in raising a sum of money to repair and improve their church building. The Central convocation held its meeting in this church on Sept. 12th and 13th.

Death of Rev. W. T. Leavell

On the 25th of August last, the Rev. William Thomas Leavell, rector of Zion church, Hedgesville, was called to the bliss of the higher life, at the age of 80. In his death, the diocese loses its oldest presbyter. He literally died in harness, having been privileged to labor over 60 years in the ministry of the Church.

Tennessee

Thomas Frank Gallor, D.D., Bishop

A correspondent writes: "In your last issue you have a very nice account of the ordination, at Pulaski, Tenn., of the 'Rev. Allison Granville.' take the liberty of telling you that the name is wrong. It should read, 'Granville Allison.'"

The Archbishops' Opinion with a Moral for the American Church

IN a recent number of The Churchman, the Rev. Dr. Richey pleads for the value of incense as sanctifying the sense of smell in divine worship, and refers to the instructive little work of a Scotch Presbyterian, entitled, we think, "The Five Gates of the Soul." By the "sweet smelling savour" of the incense, the crude smell of burning flesh upon the brazen altar of the tabernacle was converted into an offering of a sweet smell, acceptable unto the Lord. This symbolized the conversion of the prayers and offerings of sinful men, in themselves utterly defective and inadequate, into an acceptable offering through the sacrifice and intercession of Christ. All the feeble aspirations of men, their struggles upward, their appeals out of the mire of evil in which they find themselves, their poor attempts at self-denial and sacrifice, are taken up into the infinite flood of merit which resides in the one all-sufficient Sacrifice of Christ. They are enhanced, perfected, glorified. The tainted utterances and strivings of fallen men become the "prayers of the saints," of the sanctified people, a nation of kings and priests unto God. This, if anything, was the symbolism of the incense. Well might the Archbishops, in giving their opinion that the liturgical use of incense was forbidden in the Church of England by Act of Parliament, add that incense is not "an unsuitable or undesirable accompaniment of divine worship," and that "the instructions for its use by divine authority in the Jewish Church would alone forbid any such conclusion." An interesting comment on the whole subject, and especially the points made by Dr. Richey, is afforded by the account just at hand in the English papers, of the meeting of the parishioners of St. Mary's, Cardiff, at which two blind men came forward and pleaded for the continued use of incense. "One of them, in a pathetic speech, said that nothing in the whole service appealed to him more than the sweet smell of incense, which seemed to him to go up to heaven in unison with the intercession of our dear Lord and Master."

THE long expected letter of Lord Halifax has appeared in the English Church papers. As head of the Church Union, which now includes over 30,000 members, clerical and lay, his utterances have a weight which they could not have as coming from a mere private person. They are taken, perhaps too hastily, as indicating the policy likely to be pursued by the influential body over which he has so long and ably presided. His lordship addresses himself only to the lay members of the Union, and the gist of his advice is that they should support their respective priests in whatever course they may decide to pursue, in view of the recent decision of the Archbishops. The greater part of the letter is of the character of a criticism of that decision, which the writer regards as "one of the greatest misfortunes that has fallen on the Church since the rise of the Oxford Movement." This is not because of the condemnation as unlawful of one of the most significant of the ceremonial adjuncts of divine service, but because of the grounds for the condemnation, and the archiepiscoppal point of view. In his lordship's opinion, the reasoning of the Archbishops goes as far as possible "to discredit and reduce to an unreality the appeal which the Church of England has ever made to the practice of the whole Catholic Church of Christ as supplying her standard of doctrine and ceremonial." In this opinion Lord Halifax agrees with Sir William Harcourt who has declared that the "opinion" of the Archbishops cuts at the very roots of the whole Catholic movement in the Church of England, and that if the Archbishops and bishops will but proceed steadily and persistently upon the principles which have been thus formulated, they will make short work of all that has marked the Church of England most conspicuously since 1833.

IT is an ominous indication of the acute stage at which matters have arrived, that the two most distinguished lay leaders of the parties most radically opposed to each other, should be at one in their estimate of the significance of the Archbishops' decision. Sir William Harcourt is a Churchman of Protestant and Erastian principles. He regards the "opinion" of Canterbury as involving the Protestant and Erastian standpoint, and he consequently exults in it. Lord Halifax is a Churchman of Catholic principles, and he also regards the opinion as Protestant and Erastian, and he consequently deplores it. Harcourt would not have been so enthusiastic, or Halifax so cast down, if the decision had been based on other grounds. But the fact is that it is based upon an Act of Parliament. Hence this laughter, and hence these tears. Notwithstanding the superficial aspects of the case, however, we are not inclined to admit that the view taken by these distinguished gentlemen will turn out to be entirely correct. It is extremely doubtful whether the Archbishops would admit that they themselves are either Protestants or Erastians. Moreover, it is so improbable as to be almost absurd, to imagine that they or their suffragans will accept the logic of their position as obliging them to begin a settled warfare on the Catholic position.

BUT it remains true that when a question relating to the adjuncts of divine worship was submitted to the Archbishops, they decided it, not by reference to the universal usages of the undivided Church from ancient days, nor yet by appeal to the canons or spiritual laws of the English Church, but by examining the meaning of an Act of Parliament. They may have felt this to be a necessity of their position. We do not wish to discuss that point, but simply to draw attention to the fact. For there is in this fact a very important lesson for the independent branch of the Anglican Communion in the United States of America. It is a lesson against "entangling alliances." We are happily free from all State control. What this means was pointed out in very luminous terms in the address of the Bishop of Springfield to his annual synod in 1897, the year of the Lambeth Conference.

A NEW illustration of the points made in that address is afforded by the present attitude of the Anglican Archbishops in matters relating to the Prayer Book. It will be remembered that at that time it was proposed to bring the entire Anglican Communion into a closer organization, and a beginning was to be made by the establishment of a "Central Consultative Body," or a "Tribunal of Reference." The headquarters of this body would be in England, and it would be substantially under the influence of English bishops. The scheme emerged for legislative action at the General Convention of last year, and received a temporary quietus. But doubtless we have not heard the last of it. It is the sort of a thing which exercises a strong fascination upon those who are affected with a certain degree of Anglo-mania. Bishop Seymour pointed out the disadvantage at which we should stand in such an arrangement, owing to the fact that the Church of England is an "Established" Church. The dominant partner in the proposed organization would consist, "as things now are, of representatives of the British Crown first, and the English Church afterwards." If an appeal or question went from this side to the proposed "Tribunal of Reference," it would go from a body which is subject in the interpretation of its laws to no secular power, to a body which is closely allied to the Crown and Parliament of England. The Bishop aptly quotes the apostolic injunction, "Be not unequally yoked together."

IN the case before us we may read our lesson. Suppose it possible that a question relating to the worship of the Church or its ceremonial adjuncts were to take such shape that it was deemed expedient to refer it to the tribunal over the water. Here we are accustomed to take the appeal of the Anglican Church to true, as opposed to false, Catholic precedent in sober earnest, and to consider that disputed points are to be settled by reference to the undivided Church of the early ages. But the position now taken by the Archbishops makes it clear that the "Tribunal of Reference" would not feel prepared to view matters in that way. It would no longer be the law of the Church, or the limits within which customs not "undesirable or unsuitable" as accompaniments of divine worship, are allowable in accordance with the general usages of the Catholic Church, which would come into the account, but—Acts of Parliament! Nothing could better serve to illustrate the point at issue, the disadvantages under which the American Church would labor in the presence of such a tribunal. What applies to matters of worship applies equally to every department of the ecclesiastical estate. At every point the weight of Parliamentary enactments, or of Royal prerogative, would be cast into the scale. The yoke is too unequal, and it is not possible that the American Church should stultify herself by entering into any such arrangement.

THE Rev. Mr. Garth, ordained in Canada, but now officiating at an American summer resort, took occasion on a recent visit to his old friends at Ste. Agathe, near Montreal, to deliver himself on the subject of the "Higher Criticism" of the Bible. If he was desirous of notoriety, he attained it, for the time being. The people of that locality are sufficiently old-fashioned to be very well satisfied with the Bible and with the Christianity of their fathers. It appears that two members of the congregation, including an ex-mayor, rose in their places and energetically protested against Mr. Garth's teachings, and the affair assumed such proportions as to occupy a considerable amount of space in the usually quiet Canadian papers. Mr. Garth may or may not have signed a certificate at his ordination that he believes the Holy Scriptures to be "the Word of God." We do not know what the rule may be in Canada. At any rate, Mr. Garth does not now believe any such thing, except as all wise and morally or spiritually beneficial writings may be called "the word of God." In a published interview, he says: "Shakespeare was inspired; Paul was inspired; but Paul was more inspired than Shakespeare, because there was more of the Spirit of God in him." "They were both inspired by God. But Paul was the better man." Further on he says the Bible "is a Word of God, not the Word of God. Christ alone was that;" a quibble which is hardly worthy of one who undertakes to deal with such questions. The written Word and the Incarnate Word are two things, but each is the Word of God none the less. Such is Mr. Garth's "Higher Criticism."

WE do not know anything of this gentleman aside from this episode. But he blurts out some things which are commonly not expressed so plainly. We have, heretofore, warned our readers that it is not always enough to prove the soundness of a man's theological position that he should profess to believe in the "inspiration" of the Scriptures. In the instance before us we perceive at once that such a profession is absolutely meaningless. When we have extended the term so as to cover every utterance, written or spoken, from which we may derive intellectual, æsthetic, moral, or spiritual benefit, its use may as well be dropped altogether. It only confuses and misleads the unsophisticated. If the progressive preacher would tell us plainly that in his opinion the Scriptures are not "inspired" in any sense in which that word has ever been used in theology or religious teaching, but that they are profitable, precisely as other books are profitable, only in a greater degree, we should understand his position and know how to estimate him. It is strange how long men who talk so bravely of their zeal for truth will continue to juggle with language, the use of which, as they perfectly knew, cannot fail to mislead the hearer.

Marriage and Divorce

FROM BISHOP POTTER'S CONVENTION ADDRESS

OUR General Convention at its last session, gave, as you know, considerable attention to the proposed amendments of our very inadequate canon (as it seems to me) of marriage and divorce. Its councils were, as you are aware, divided upon the question whether that canon could best be amended by withdrawing from it all authorization of re-marriage, whether under the sanction of our Lord's words in St. Matthew xix: 9, or otherwise; or, by making more stringent the conditions under which it should be competent for the Ordinary to sanction with the authority of these words the re-marriage of the innocent party to a divorce. I need not re-open that discussion here. The Church will doubtless always be divided as to the authority of those words of Holy Scripture to which I have referred, and no less divided as to the measure of discretion which it is wise to vest in the Ordinary. But, meantime, the whole subject has gained a new aspect from events to which I need not more particularly refer here, which have undoubtedly awakened in all sober-minded Christian people a profound sense of alarm; and the consensus of opinion among them as to the necessity of legislation which shall prohibit the re-marriage of divorced persons, under any circumstances whatever, has greatly widened and deepened.

I am by no means sure that such a conclusion is not the wisest that we may reach at present; for undoubtedly it must be owned that, in the face of such a danger as threatens us, the only safe course must be to prohibit absolutely that which, while it might be permissible if we could always be sure that it had a Scriptural justification for it, is only wrong and evil when that justification, existing in fact, exists only because it has been fraudulently obtained. Here the judgment of eminent publicists and legal authorities concur, and some of them of foremost rank as jurists and Churchmen, have agreed in the opinion that our only safe canon, in view of the tendencies painfully evident among us, is one in which the Church refuses re-marriage to persons divorced for any cause arising after marriage, absolutely and universally.

Such a remedy for our present evils would doubtless be, as some of us may think, a very drastic one, but the evil has grown to such proportions, it may justly be answered, that we can meet it with no other; and in one sense this is undoubtedly true. A wider view of the whole subject, however, will disclose to us, I think, the fact that it is not the only remedy, and that if accepted as a final solution of the whole social problem, of which, after all, it is but a small part, we are destined to be disappointed as to its results.

For that wider view will reveal to us that the social relations of our time, in all their various ramifications, have been profoundly affected by causes which reside in the character of our free institutions and in that Zeitgeist, that spirit of the age, in which the historian of the future will discern perhaps its mightiest force. I may best describe that spirit, so far as we are concerned with it, as the spirit of individualism. The great movement which issued here in the revolt of the American colonies and their subsequent separation from the mother country, was only part of a larger whole, which profoundly affected not only the mother country, but France, Germany, and, later, Italy; which is at work to-day even in Russia, and which has wholly or partially dethroned some of the most widely ruling ideas of earlier ages. I may not trace its progress elsewhere, but here, at any rate, it has issued in the almost complete abrogation of some earlier forms of authority, and not only that, but of some of the most venerable and sacred traditions of the community and the State. In this direction nothing has been more serious than those results which have affected the family, and especially the institutions and obligations of marriage. These last have come to be so lightly regarded that now, at length, the least thoughtful among us are beginning to realize the vicious tendencies in some forty or fifty different commonwealths of our composite and contradictory legislation; and to recognize that the facility with which the marriage relation may be taken on and put off, is a menace to the foundations of society, and the jest of the civilized world.

It would be well that the Church should meet such a situation with a stern front, and with legislation which, so far as she is concerned, will make divorce increasingly difficult, if not impossible. But she must do a great deal more than that; and she must beware of the delusion that in doing only that she has done anything more than a very small part of her duty. However we may safeguard the solemnization of Holy Matrimony, we must no less lift up and safeguard the approaches to it. No legislation, whether ecclesiastical or civil, which touches only the terms and conditions of the contract itself, will do a work which must needs be done before it is entered into. We may reiterate with utmost solemnity, "Those whom God hath joined together let no man put asunder"; it will be quite in vain, unless we see to it that those reasonable precautions of forethought, inquiry, publicity, and of intelligent understanding of the obligations to be assumed, which once obtained, have preceded it. These were wise provisions of our fathers' times, but that spirit of individualism which, in the case of the authority of the Church, would brook none of these things, has swept them away; and a man and a woman—a boy and girl, indeed—to all intents and purposes, may walk into the study of a priest in this diocese, and be married out of hand, without any license from the State, or warning from the Church, or any other preliminary, in fact, than such as consists in—must I say it?—the sometimes very indifferent discretion of the minister. Believe me, no canon of marriage which does not reach back a good way in a precautionary discretion will be, here, of any substantial avail; and if we are aiming, as I hope we may, to set a higher standard here, I hope it may be wide enough at its base to include aspects of this whole subject which in our current discussions of it are largely overlooked.

For here the Church's office should not be merely to re-establish and exalt the ancient sanctities of marriage, but first of all that most ancient institution in which it took its rise. The decay of the august sacredness of marriage in our day is not more alarming than the painful tokens which salute us of the disintegration of the home. A clever paper which I saw not long ago in a foreign periodical, describes a home which had lost its surviving parent. The executor of the estate, a life-long friend of the family, is pointing out to the family the resources available to them if they continue to live together, and each in turn gives the reasons which, in the case of the several individuals, make any such course impossible. They are frivolous reasons, supremely selfish reasons; but they triumph, to the complete breaking up of a home, and furnish one more illustration of the disintegrating power, even when it touches so sacred and venerable a thing, of individualism. We must needs recognize that vicious influence in the decay of parental authority, in the early impatience of it on the part of boys and girls, in the increasing reluctance to exercise it where its exercise involves pain and painstaking, in the strident note in one word, in so many homes whose cry is: "I will," or "I won't," and not, "I ought."

Such a situation, dear brethren, calls for clear and plain teaching from the pulpit, and the still mightier teaching of a fine and high example in all our homes. If we are to see in the matter of our domestic obligations, whether they are marital, filial, or parental, that wide awakening of the Christian conscience which our land so sorely needs, it will be because the principle of a divine authority over all these relations has been revived and enthroned anew among us, and because in the training of our children, and in the consecration of every other most sacred tie, we have refused to go below it.

Theistic Evolution

FROM The Interior (Presbyterian)

THE phrase "Theistic Evolution," when employed as a term of philosophy or of theology, is a self-contradiction. The Outlook prints this inexcusable blunder on the title-page of its new "theological" serial, and then immediately emphasizes it. "I acknowledge myself," writes Dr. Abbott, "to be a radical Evolutionist—it is hardly necessary to say a Theistic Evolutionist." It would scarcely be possible to write a sentence which would equal this in absurdity. There is a self-contradiction in each of its clauses, and it is rendered the more preposterous by the employment of the word "radical." It is as if one should proclaim himself a "radical geometrician." Radicalism is a passion. It resides in the emotions, not in the reason. It is in its nature contradictory to both science and philosophy. Its synonym in this connection is fanaticism: "I am a fanatical scientist," or "I am a fanatical philosopher." He may be a fanatic, and he might be a scientist, but he cannot be both. So he might be a Theist, or he might be an Evolutionist, but he cannot be both.

If you should ask any professor of biology or a professor of ethnology, philology, geology, astronomy, or physical geography, if he believed in Evolution, he would undoubtedly answer, Yes. But if you asked him, in the proper connection, if he were an Evolutionist, he would understand you to be inquiring whether he were an Evolutionist as opposed to the Creationist. The distinction between the science and the philosophy is perfectly well understood by all those who give any attention to the subject. To claim, therefore, under the title, "The Theology of Evolution," that the science of Evolution is antagonistic to Evangelical Christianity, and to assume to act as the exponent of the science in making this declaration, is the brassiest impudence.

Dr. Abbott might charitably be regarded as having employed the word Evolutionist ignorantly, and to be attempting, in the most ridiculous fashion, to found a system of theology upon an obvious blunder. But if, on the contrary, he is qualified by knowledge to discuss the subject coherently, then he is practicing a fraud. Let us consider this question: He enumerates various theories of moral and spiritual existence; first, Creationism; second, Traducianism, or spiritual heredity; and—

The third is Evolutionism—the doctrine that this higher life in man, this moral, this ethical, this spiritual nature, has been developed by natural processes, as the higher physical phases of life have been developed by natural processes.

Now let us state, with as much compression and simplicity as possible, an outline of the theory of Evolution.

Evolution is a theory of the process of change from the simple to the complex in nature. Herbert Spencer, the great ex-pounder of Evolution, says it is a change from the homogeneous to the heterogeneous. A rain-cloud is homogeneous, every part of it is like every other part, and the whole of it is charged with electrical force. Thus Laplace conceived that all the materials and forces in the solar system once existed in the form of a vast homogeneous nebula, such as astronomers now discover in space. Herbert Spencer takes this as his primitive conception, and shows the causes which produce variety. Under the operation of these causes, the homogeneous nebula evolved heterogeneous spheres—the sun and its planets. These causes operating continually on the earth gave vast variety to the phenomena of both force and matter. Out of the myriad forms of manifestation came one, a combination of force and of matter, which we know as organic life. The first form of this combination was a single cell of protoplasm containing a vital nucleus. They are to be found now in plenty in warm pools, and are called amoeba. The law of heterogeneity impelled this nearly homogeneous cell to take on other cells, another and another; the organisms built up thus survived and propagated, if their surroundings were favorable—those not adapted to their surroundings, perishing—until out of an infinite variety of animal forms, at last one emerged which had the widest and highest range of adaptation of all, and that was primitive man. Man impelled by the same law, evolved all the faculties and activities of high character and civilization.

All these processes and phenomena were natural. They were the necessary and inevitable effects of causes which existed in primordial matter. Tyndall said he found it in the "potency" and also the "promise" of everything that has appeared, as he would find in an apple-tree the potency and promise of blossoms and fruit. There was therefore no necessity for the interference of an intelligent and designing Cause, and there is no evidence that any such interposition ever occurred.

This is the "ism" which is trying to fasten itself upon Evolution. We have employed the cogent and calm tone which is proper to the agnostic philosopher. In a gourd-like skull, however, it becomes "radical," noisy, fanatical, and otherwise senseless and violent. It nearly always takes on these symptoms in the case of a renegade preacher. Of this we now have another example.

Now the philosophical Evolutionist says, with mathematical truthfulness, that nothing can be evolved which was not involved; that out of nothing nothing comes; that all which eventuated, previously existed; that if we admit the possibility of the interposition of a power higher than, and different from, those which resided in primordial matter, then we shall have made an end of Evolution, we shall have no natural law, the foundation of his philosophy will be destroyed. He resents as impertinent and illogical, every kind of theological speculation. He says that it is deadly to progress in scientific knowledge, because it paralyzes research for proximate causes.

The science of Evolution is a more rational matter. It studies the amoeba and discovers the process by which it propagates itself, and by which it grows into a higher form. The science limits itself strictly to discoverable facts. It is this science which is taught and employed in all institutions of learning. It does not concern itself about final causes. It will be noticed in any textbook that the author confines himself to observable facts, avoids speculations—in other words, is strictly scientific.

This brings us clearly to the mountain-wall which separates Evolutionism from Creationism. That mountain-wall is Design. The instant one admits the interposition of design, he passes from Evolution to Creation. If there be design, then all this long line of the processes of development are processes of creation, not unintelligent Evolution. It is the work of a Designer, working to a purpose, and controlling and directing the forces of nature, which are neither more nor less than his own energies in active employment.

Dr. Leroy Hooker recently very correctly said that "what we call the laws of nature are simply the habits of God in operating His universe. Law is never self-operative, never possesses self-executive force. There must be a living executive behind it, or it will cease to be law." God controls men—controls the streams of independent human tendency, as a man dams a river, changes its course, and employs its potency in production. The old Psalmist explained this better than we can. He said that God makes the wrath of man to praise Him—turns it squarely around, and makes it do what it was seeking to undo.

This Power must be outside of nature in the sense of being above it, superior to it. Of course this Power is in nature—He must be in it or He could not work. But we do not confuse Him with, or lose sight of Him in, nature, any more than we lose sight of a miller because he is operating a mill, nor say that he is the mill, or the mill him.

We can understand how a man whose whole horizon is closed by the walls of a city, and whose knowledge is infiltrated into him from the writings of other men who are similarly situated—how such a man may theorize about nature without design, and how a florist's conservatory may attract a man's eye away from God to the gardener; but we do not know how it is possible for one to overlook design in free and wild nature. A mathematician cannot put a demonstration upon a blackboard that is more convincing. There it is—not only the delicate and delightful handiwork of an artificer, but a passion for the beautiful which is only possible to a creative Spiritual Being.

Where do these propositions and facts, none of which will, we presume, be disputed—where do they place this newest theologian of The Outlook? He announces himself to be a radical Evolutionist, fanatically antagonistic to the idea of Theistic creation, and then adds that he is a Theistic Evolutionist! That requires super-human agility in jumping from side to side.

But his real position, whether he has taken it consciously or unconsciously, ignorantly or of purpose, is indicated by his prefatory announcement that he is a "radical Evolutionist," which is fairly interpretable to mean that he is a radical, fanatical, and therefore unreasonable, unscientific, agnostic Evolutionist. He contradicts himself, of course, throughout, as he must in expounding the compound contradiction involved in his title-page, and employs the familiar expressions which imply evangelical faith, which is far from being creditable to him.

He consistently, however, ridicules the idea of Divine interposition. He rejects the truthfulness of the records of miracles, prophecy, incarnation, everything that implies the immediate power of the Creator and Ruler. All this is entirely consistent with, and necessary to, the role of a radical Evolutionist.

It is scarcely necessary to inquire where this leaves Christianity—we will not say evangelical Christianity, but religion of any type or form. We will, therefore, inquire only what its effect is upon religion in our families and churches. It paralyzes the prayer-meeting to all who are misled by it; if God cannot, or will not, interpose, there is no use in praying to Him. It paralyzes the preaching of the Gospel in every mind that is filled with it; if God did not interpose in His Son, there is no true Gospel. It ridicules miracle; if Christ did not conquer death and rise from the tomb, there is no resurrection. If the soul was developed from the dust, to dust it will return, and there is no immortality. We have shown that this monstrosity is not science, that it is not philosophy, that it is not even a correlating theory—and now we have also shown that it is not theology, either old or new.

The Congregational Council

PRESIDENT ANGELL opened the Congregational Council in Boston with sentiments which were inspired by the recent history of the Presbyterian Church. "We have to deal with problems, not of the seventeenth century, but of the twentieth."

Therefore we must leave large liberty of thought and expression in our fold. We have always emphasized the importance of intellectual activity in our teachers and preachers. We must not cripple their usefulness on the plea of preserving orthodoxy by binding them with fetters which men, no more enlightened nor devout than they, have forged in the past. We honor the Church Fathers best by renouncing their errors. Let us rejoice if, on our most advanced picket lines, we have some choice spirits who can view the dawn of larger truth than we have yet seen. Let us not burn any of them as heretics, but wait patiently to see if they are not our prophets.

These sentiments were received with great applause. The keynote which was thus sounded reverberated through every day of the sittings. The second day, Dr. Forsythe, of Cambridge, England, illustrated Dr. Angell's liberty. His position was that the Bible is not the supreme authority:

The Bible broke the yoke of the Church, but there are those to whom the Bible has become a yoke. The Gospel must do for the Bible what the Bible did for the Church. The Gospel made the Bible and must rule it; if the Church had made the Bible, the Church would rule it and be its final interpreter. Neither Church tradition nor Christian consciousness is the final appeal; it is the Gospel rather than the Bible. The final authority is the Redeemer. The key and goal of the Bible is the Gospel, as God's forgiving act in Christ.

The Church made the canon and is superior to her own work, etc. All this is mystifying. What is this Gospel that is to rule the Bible? We do not write to criticize, but to observe, and therefore defer comment. Dr. George P. Fisher, of Yale, followed on the same lines. The day of dogmatic theology is past, he said. Does he mean that the day for Christian doctrine is past? Here is more mystification. Dr. Porter, of Yale, was even more radical.

The third day, Dr. Lyman Abbott took national expansion for a part of his theme, and eloquently advocated it, desired a coparcenary of the English speakers in the business of civilizing the world, attacked tariffs, and was vigorously applauded, and eulogized the Czar's peace conference.

Principal Fairbairn, on the study of comparative religion, said: "The man whose eyes are not open to the best of all other faiths will be blind to the real good of his own." He had his startling periods, also—especially in contrasting early Old Testament history with an ideal Hindooism. Dr. Bournemouth, of England, said that hell is not a dynamic of Christianity, another Delphic expression.

The fourth day was led off by Dr. Graham Taylor, of Chicago—theme, "The Social Problems." The amount of the day's discussion was rating the Churches for their abstemiousness in this regard.

To sum up the council, we would say that Congregationalism has shipped her anchors, broken the face of her chronometer, and is making her reckonings by pointing her sextant at comets. If we were sportively inclined, we would lay a heavy wager that there is not a man in the council who could, to save his soul,—if he have any!—tell what Congregationalism now is, where it now is, what is its cargo, or where it is bound. We don't like a storm at sea, but give us a wave-scalar any day in preference to a fog.—The Interior.

Letters to the Editor

SEPARATE SCHOOLS FOR COLORED MEN

To the Editor of The Living Church:

It is too bad "the negro question" must be kept before the world as one which is so easy of solution. The negro has as warm friends south of Mason and Dixon line as north of it, but the reason lies nearer home. The education of those men for Holy Orders in seminaries along side of white men is a mistake, socially and religiously. Socially, because the colored man is very susceptible, and his absorbed ideas of the white man's habits and ways would unfit him for the simple work he intends to do among his own people. That work is, chiefly, to educate the minds of the race to right thinking and doing; to overcome dense ignorance and racial superstition, and to hold before them the pure Gospel of Christ. The men whom we send to do this work should be naturally colored men, and capable of coping with their own race.

We should bring into this question the rules of common-sense, and cease to impute prejudice where charity and experience have governed the separation of the races. Co-racial education along theological lines is an error, and while seemingly the just thing, yet justice and prudence cry out: "Teach our colored clergy how to think aright along the lines of righteousness, and befriend them in their work, but do not force upon them an alien idea of their calling." I am a friend to the negro, but my desire is to see that race living along natural lines. The one great crime, socially, to-day, is the appeal made to the negro that he is to demand social distinction. A colored man said a few years ago in Cleveland, Ohio: "When those that live on Euclid avenue open their doors and receive me and my family into their parlors on equal terms, then I'll believe their invitation to join their church sincere." Just so; and I believe no greater work could be done by the Commission on Colored Work than to enlarge the existing institutions and seminaries for the exclusive education of the colored theological students.

Dr. Grint himself would be among the first to rebel were the colored students of The Bishop Payne Divinity School in Petersburg, Va., to enter the General Seminary, and that because such a step would be taking the Doctor too literally: An isolated student here and anon seems passable, but to group the races would deplete the halls now in Chelsea square. This would not arise from any race prejudice, nor lack of Christian brotherhood, but from that innate something which all men possess in regard to mixing men of the different races. A man can befriend without patronizing, and prophets can be raised up from among the colored people whom the Church can trust to lead those people aright, and along lines which appeal to the better nature of that race. "The old prejudice of Peter and Cornelius" has nothing to do with the question, and there is not a Christian gentleman in the South or North who would call the colored race as St. Peter dreamed he had called the Gentiles of his day. The question is one of solution by men who have had life-long experience with the colored race, and the question of Catholic usage, just now, falls by the roadside. Sewanee and Alexandria are not saturated with race prejudice, but those institutions know the colored race as a whole, and in kindness to the colored man, insist on his education among his own people.

FRANCIS E. McMANUS.

Sept. 22, 1899.

To the Editor of The Living Church:

Presbyter—why don't he sign his name?—is hardly ingenious in his criticism of my short note in your issue of Sept. 23d. The preceding paragraphs show that our institutions south of the Mason and Dixon line were referred to. However, he and I are, I think, in agreement on one point—that there ought not to be special schools for the education of colored men for the ministry, because all theological seminaries ought to welcome them sincerely and heartily. Our religion is Catholic. The Holy Church founded by our Blessed Lord was designed to embrace all nations, within whose fold there should be no distinction drawn between the poor and the rich, the bond and the free, the black and the white. If, then, the love of Christ reigns in the heart, then all men ought to be welcomed to prepare for that holiest work—the work of the sacred ministry. When, then, our Southern institutions act otherwise—when they close their doors to a devout man of scholarly attainments, merely because his skin is black, then I have no hesitancy in saying that a spirit is displayed that is utterly foreign to the Catholic religion of our Blessed Master. Sewanee has done noble work, and Alexandria has graduated many noble men. But the color line ought not to prevail in the realm of religion.

ALFRED POOLE GRINT.

THE BISHOP PAYNE DIVINITY SCHOOL

To the Editor of The Living Church:

Our attention has been called to an article in THE LIVING CHURCH of Sept. 16, 1899, signed "Presbyter," in which the writer asks the general question: "Is it right" to support "colored" divinity schools? He then proceeds to attack the Bishop Payne Divinity School, located in Petersburg, Va. We are not disposed to discuss, at length, the general question proposed. By those who know the work, separate institutions are considered absolutely essential to its success. Two days ago we heard Archdeacon Pollard, of North Carolina, say that it would be almost impossible to get colored men, trained in the "white" seminaries of the North, to do the work under the conditions which exist in the South. The Commission on Work among the Colored People, and the large majority, if not all, of the Southern bishops know this to be the case.

Our brother "Presbyter," we believe, has unconsciously done the Bishop Payne Divinity School, of which he speaks in particular, a serious injustice. If the school is indeed and in truth "a little colored kindergarten," devoted to training men to conduct "Methodist class meetings," or to violate the rubrics and canons of the Church, then the presbyter who is seeking to "raise an endowment of $50,000 for this institution" should receive no encouragement or support from the Church. Under such conditions we would fully agree with "Presbyter." We are convinced that "Presbyter" wrote in ignorance of the truth as to the work which has been done by the Payne Divinity School. Did he know that Archdeacon Russell whose excellent address to the convocation is quoted, was trained in the Bishop Payne Divinity School? Had he known that the Rev. J. H. M. Pollard, archdeacon of North Carolina; the Rev. Thos. W. Cain, of Galveston, Tex.; the Rev. J. W. Johnson, formerly of St. Philip's, Richmond, now professor in Bishop Payne Divinity School; the Rev. W. P. Burke, of Norfolk, Va.; the Rev. Geo. F. Bragg, of Baltimore; the Rev. John C. Dennis, of Georgia; the Rev. Joseph Mitchell, of Newport News, and the Rev. S. D. Phillips, of Philadelphia, were the presbyters who had been trained by this school, we are sure that he would not have styled it a kindergarten institution, unworthy of the support of the Church. These are all the presbyters who have been trained in this institution. The Church who knows these men has confidence in them, and supports their work. Eighteen other men have been trained by this school who are now in deacons' Orders. Four of these expect soon to be ordained to the priesthood. Most of the others will remain in deacons' Orders. Of one of these, a distant Southern bishop recently wrote us: "He is by far the best colored man I have at work in my diocese"; and added that in his judgment, the appropriation made to this institution by the Commission, was "one of the best, if not the best, appropriation made by the Commission." The faculty of this school would unanimously join Archdeacon Russell in his protest against the un Churchly conduct of the service on the part of some men. We repudiate any responsibility for such conduct.

The Bishop Payne Divinity School has done its best under most trying circumstances. Since 1878, it has been training men for the sacred ministry of the Church. It has given much. It has received little. Men have taught, and are teaching, in this institution at great personal sacrifice. Any bishop of the Church who knows the work will bear witness to this fact. It hurts us who for years have prayed and labored to maintain this work for the Christ and His Church, to read such articles as the one in your paper of the 16th inst. We would be glad for "Presbyter" to come to see us. He might then help us to raise the $50,000 we so much need.

WM. A. R. GOODWIN, M. A., Presbyter,
Professor in Bishop Payne Divinity School.
